LITERARY NOTES.

A new Mulvaney story is said to be in progress under the pen of Rudyard Kipling. He has lately been writing a series of Japanese stories.

Of Mr. Kipling's "Ballads" it is reported that 10,000 copies have been sold in England, a third edition being now in the press. Six of the ballads have been set to music for publication. The musical version of "Tommy" has been dedicated to the British Army.

Miss Constance Fenimore Woolson has given up her Italian home and is now living in beautiful old Oxford, where she has made many friends.

A strange omission of four pages from the English and American editions of the Talleyrand Memoirs is attributed to the French publishers or the French editor. The French proofs which were sent to England for translation, and which were regularly paged to the end of the volume, did not include the two notable papers in which the dying Talleyrand made his peace with the Roman Church. These, having appeared in the French edition, have been translated and wisely printed on a leaflet by Messrs. Putnam for insertion in the last volume of the Memoirs. The first of the two documents is the retraction of Talleyrand, which runs thus:

Moved more and more by solemn considerations, and forced to consider impartially the consequences of a revolution which has involved everything and had lasted for fifty years, I find myself obliged, after a long life and much experience, to blame the excesses of the time in which I have lived, and heartily to condemn the grave errors which, in this long truin of years, have so vexed and troubled the Catholic, Apostolic and Romish Church—excesses to which I myself have unfortunately contributed.

If it please Monseigneur the Archbishop of Paris, who has already assured me of the charitable disposition of the Sovereign Pontiff toward me, to present to the Holy Father, in accordance with my wishes, my confession and my entire submission to the doctrine and discipline of the Church, and to the decisions and mandates of the Holy See in all the ecclesiastical affairs of France, I dare to trust that His Holiness will graciously deign to accept such submission.

Being, at one time, exempted, by the venerable Pius VII from the exercise of ecclesiastical functions, I have sought during my long political career for opportunities on which to render to religion and to many honored and distinguished members of the Catholic clergy any services in my power. I have never ceased to consider myself as other than a child of the Church.

I deplore, afresh, those acts, of my life, which have offended the Church, and my last prayers will be for her and for her supreme leader.

Accompanying this document is a letter written by Talleyrand to Pope Gregory on the same day:

The young and pious child, who lightens my old age with the tenderest and most touching cares, has just informed me of the benevolence with which Your Holiness is inclined to regard me; telling me of the joy with which she awaits the consecrated objects, and for which she has so fondly longed. I am impressed, as I was when the Archbishop of Paris first brought them to me.

Before being enfeebled by the grave malady with which I am now afflicted, I desire, Holy Father, to express to you my feelings and my submission. I dare to hope that Your Holiness will not only deign to accept these favorably, but that you, in your justice, will remember the circumstances which have influenced my actions.

The Memoirs, finished some time since, but which, according to my wishes, will not appear until thirty years after my death, will explain to posterity my conduct during the revolutionary epoch. I must content myself to-day, in order not to fatigue the Holy Father, by simply drawing his attention to the general disorder of the time in which I lived. The respect which I owe to those who gave me birth, does not, however, prevent my saying that all my youth was spent in preparation for a profession, for which I was, by character, unfitted.

For the rest, I cannot now act more wisely, than by abandoning myself, as I have done in all things, to the justice and charity of the Church and her venerable Head. I am, most Holy Father, with respect, Your Holiness's very humble and submissive son and servant.

CHARLES MAURICE, PRINCE DE TALLEYRAND.
Written March 10, 1838.
(Signed, Paris, May 17, 1838.)

An edition of Miss Strickland's "Queens of England," printed from new plates and richly illustrated, is announced by Lippincott. It will be issued in eight octavo volumns.

Mrs. Oliphant has just published a new novel, "Diana Trelawney"—which is described as an uncommonly strong book—and is about to bring out another entitled "The Cuckoo in the Nest."

An Englishman connected with one of the greatest publishing houses in the world declares that barely a half of the books published produce a profit at all, and not 10 per cent result in profit worthy of the name. He adds: "Books have been bought for £25, as was the case with Anstey's 'Vice-Versa,' which would have been cheap at £500, but £1,000 has been given before now for books which would have been dear at a gift." Profits, he asserts, are derived from the books of utility, the school books and the cookery books, the technical and juvenile books, the production of which costs perhaps a few pence and which sell for two or three shillings.

Mr. Swinburne's lately published tragedy, "The Sisters," is said to have been written very quickly—within a month, in fact.

It is now stated that M. Zola doesn't intend to write a novel about the Lourdes pilgrimages. He is already at work upon the story which is to close his "Rougon-Macquart" series. It is to be called "Le Docteur Pascal," and will be published as a serial during the coming year. One who has heard something about the plot and the motive of the story says it promises to be rather tedious.

The volume on "English Cathedrals," which Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer has written, and Mr. Joseph Pennell has illustrated, will soon be published by "The Century" Company.
