NEW CASES OF CHOLERA.

terrible position. Do you realize that they must feel almost like condemned prisoners awaiting execution? What would we do if our friends or relatives were among them? No relief has yet been given while the number is increasing, the agony becoming more intense, and only a few overworked officials stand between them and a horrible death.

Let the citizens of New-York subscribe $50,000 or more to-day to convert Sandy Hook, which has room for the establishment of scores of isolated communities without endangering each other or the mainland, into a quarantine. The Government and State can send tents.

Forward checks to the prominent dailies, whose managers, used to grapping with emergencies, will act as a committee, and accomplish the result in two days if it be possible. Then let one hundred physicians and nurses be sent, whatever the cost, to aid the officials. Volunteers can give their names likewise to-day. Hamburg to save a few thousand dollars has lost millions. Can New-York afford to lose its full trade by temporizing? ACTION.

STAGNANT WATER IN THE TOMBS.

When it was feared that the cholera would reach this country the Commissioners of Charities determined to assertain the sanitary condition of every public institution in the city and asked the wardens to make a report. The warden of the Tombs informed the commissioners yesterday that the cellar of that prison was full of stagnant water. The matter will be turned over to the supervisor of the board of engineers.

A LETTER FROM THE NORMANNIA.

COMPLAINT OF ONE OF THE WOMEN PASSENGERS OF UNJUSTIFIABLE TREATMENT.

Mrs. S. L. Ballantine, of Port Huron, Mich., is one of the cabin passengers on the Normannia, and her husband has come East to meet her. On Tuesday morning she wrote him the following letter:

The morning of another day. The fresh ocean breeze is bringing us hope and strength. The sorrowful foreshadowings of last night have fled away. There is no case of illness that we know of on the great vessel. I have an idea that we are better off than our sister ships in the anchorage—the Normannia and the Rugia. Our captain would like to send some of his men to help in the care of their sick, but does not feel it safe to reduce his own number of workmen.

The stokers, who were taken off by the Fletcher yesterday morning, came back last night all washed and purified—bringing their rolls of bedding upon their backs. The sick men were then carried away, and so was the body of the one who died at 1 p. m. yesterday.

We have many dear little children on board and delicate women, and all are in a comfortable measure of health and strength this morning. No one complains of the imposition of quarantine, every one being willing to undergo the detention—but the feeling is very general among us, that just and considerate dealing with these quarantined ships—adequate attention in the line of provisions and caring for the removal of the sick and dead—in short proper treatment of these thousands shut in and afloat in the harbor—is beyond the present facilities of the New-York Quarantine. Its authorities have undertaken tasks beyond their powers. It is true, that twenty boats and their loads of human freight have been prevented from making a landing. This is well as it should be. But what good is to come from our present lack of water—no supply came yesterday—we are not well supplied with disinfectants—business men are here in large numbers, yet no mail was taken from the ship after yesterday morning. We who are used to the many boats of our own Michigan ports, cannot find much use in, or admiration for the two or three inadequate, bathing little crafts, that came up to our side with so much sputtering and fuss, tossing little crift that came up to our sides with so much sputtering and fuss.

I think some coal must eb had to-day, so that in case of storm our captain may put out to sea. He cannot leave his boat to pound in these shallows. In event of not having coal to go any distance, the captain will feel himself justified in steaming up to the upper anchorage and remaining there. We have now no sick, and no reason remains for our detention so many miles from the city.

New-York seems to be poorly prepared to care for the victims of her quarantine. The papers talk of the "cholera fleet," of the vessels as "plague ships" and "pest ships." Our Normannia is called the "centre of the infection" and in so dangerous a state as to render approach to her unsafe, and yet to-day there are 1,000 well people condemned to live for days between her decks. Where are the carefully-equipped and comfortable quarters that should be all ready for such an emergency as this? "Look before you leap" is good advice just now to give the quarantine authorities of the second city of the world. Its boasted readiness to cope with the plague has been tested and found wanting. There has been no panic, or approach to such, on the Noemannia, newspaper reports to the contrary notwithstanding. She holds a company of 1,000 men, women and children, patiently waiting for simple justice. Our vessel is considered as infected with cholera. Why, in the name of common humanity, are we, who are well, kept here in such danger? "We have no ships to use for your separation from the vessel," is answered by Quarantine; and yet New-York has proclaimed to the world her complete readiness to cope with the threatening pestilence. Quarantine among barbarous nations may mean shutting out and letting alone, but Christian America ought to put a somewhat different construction upon the word. If the pleasant weather holds, sickness may be kept at bay for a time. In case of heavy wind or of rain, an uncomfortable state of things must follow, and the women and tender children will suffer. We hope and pray that New-York's escape from cholera may no longer be purchased by such infliction as is now ours to bear. The living and well, demand the removal from all danger of infection at the hands of quarantine. They are powerless to do for themselves. The elaborate cooking has all been dispensed with. We have good, plain food. Unless we are provisioned to-day, it will be still plainer. The stewards of the second cabin, who compose the Normannia's orchestra, have been excused from further musical effort on our account. The poor fellows are sadly over-worked. This is true also of the workers in the saloon dining-room. The less elaborate menu is welcomed by all of us.

I do not think that I have mentioned before in my letters that Herr Professor Xaver Scharwenka, the great pianist and director of the Scharwenka Conservatory, in New-York, is on board with his family. Frau Scharwenka is a charming Russian lady and a great linguist, as so many of her nation are. Their home is to be in Brooklyn. We are to have a concert on Friday evening. It will be very select—not even one of New-York's "Four Hundred" invited.

Later: We understand that Sunday and Labor Day, were causes for our being neglected somewhat on Sunday and yesterday. Is "Sunday Closing," now ruling in New-York? "The better the day, the better the deed" is our way of thinking—when Sunday noon came our sick were yet with us. All day on Saturday the dead lay awaiting the coming of the boat that came not.

What a quarantine! Let those whose business it is look well into the matter. Give the Health Officer not only authority to coerce and forbid, but adequate means to deal humanely and justly with the quarantined in the port of New-York. The line of cholera defence is strong in one way and cruelly defective in another. We have five fine physicians on board, and in the event of sickness among the cabin and saloon passengers, care and skill will not be lacking. We all hope to survive this ordeal, in spite of quarantine. Every one is brave and trying to be cheerful. The sick are cared for in hospitals. We have no dead. God's name be praised for all his mercies toward us. It was a thankful company that gathered in the saloon on Sunday evening to sing and to pray.

ONE OF THE ONE THOUSAND.

AMONG THE SHIPS AT QUARANTINE.

SOME OF THEM ALLOWED TO COME UP; SOME STILL DETAINED.

Upper Quarantine held a fairly large fleet last night, but it looked clear and empty in comparison with its appearance of the preceding night, when seventeen big steamships lay there. Early in the morning, however, it looked bad at the Narrows, for there was a fleet there still larger than the night before. Besides a number of schooners and barks there were twenty-one steamships, and traffic by water was seriously impeded. The big ships were in one another's way, and the swift tide made it a dangerous thing for them to move when they weighed anchor to leave Quarantine. The steamships which lay at Upper Quarantine yesterday were in the order named: La Bourgogne, Stubbenhak, Persian Monarch, Darmstadt, Elbe, Brilliant, Cachemire, Elysian, Venezuela, Diamant, Lisbonense, Massachusetts, Wyoming, Corean, March, Johannes Brun, Sama, Adirondack, Mark Lane, Waesland, Oevenum, Port Jackson and Holstein.

At about 10 o'clock in the morning the big International navigation vessel City of New-York steamed up and cast anchor off Rosebank, north of Quarantine. La Bourgogne will be allowed to go up to-day. The Elysia was allowed to pass to her pier yesterday. The Darmstadt was allowed to go to her pier, the Holstein followed, and then the disabled March went up under tow. The Wyoming, with 278 passengers, was held. The Persian Monarch and the Brilliant went up early in the morning. The big Spree, which came in late in the afternoon, was held, and will be detained. But her mails were to be disinfected and sent to the city late last night. The steamer Hazelkirk took off the passengers of the steamship Corean and brought them to this city. The steamship Wyoming was carefully inspected by Dr. Tallmadge. She had 278 cabin passengers and 363 steerage. Among the latter were fifty Russian Jews. The steamship Waesland, from Antwerp, arrived at Upper Quarantine with 100 cabin and 475 steerage passengers. She will be detained for some days, although no disease was reported on board.

Dr. Jenkins's statement that Sandy Hook might be utilized as a quarantine station for the cabin passengers of the detained ships, has called attention to this comparatively unknown Government reservation.

The passengers of the Persian Monarch, which arrived at Quarantine early on Tuesday morning, knew nothing of the cholera being in the harbor of New-York, and, in fact, were not seriously alarmed over the cholera in England. The Persian Monarch sailed from London one day before the cholera broke out there. She had more passengers than usual because the Hamburg-American line steamships were overcrowded. There were fifty-six cabin and twenty-three steerage passengers. The pilot boarded the ship about 500 miles out, and he knew nothing about cholera in the harbor either. He brought papers from London, which had been read there by the passengers before they left England, having been brought to America by a fast ship. It was not, therefore, till Sandy Hook was passed that the passengers had any suspicion that there was something wrong. Then the three plague ships, and the hospital hulk in the Lower Bay, and the yellow flag flying on the hospital islands, told their tale to Captain Bristow. But he refrained from telling his passengers what he suspected till the sight of the huge fleet in the Narrows aroused their curiosity. There was dismay aboard, which changed to jubilation when it was learned that they would not be held long, and that the cholera had not yet appeared in the city.

There has been some talk about the detention of pilots on quarantined vessels. The fear was expressed that it would make the pilot boats shorthanded if many vessels were held in quarantine. An effort will probably be made to get Dr. Jenkins to make some arrangement by which pilots may escape quarantine. Their assertion is that they are on the bridge while they are on board of the vessel. That, therefore, the danger of their getting the infection is exceedingly slight. The pilots who are now aboard the plague ships are Frank Nelson, of New-Jersey, who boarded the Normannia from pilot boat No. 4, of New-Jersey, and Daniel Parsons, of New-York, who boarded the Rugia from the New-York pilot boat No. 4.

The police regulations at the Lower Bay have been well enforced as far as small craft, such as tugs, rowboats and sailing vessels are concerned. But it is a strange fact that the Monmouth and Sandy Hook are allowed to pass so close that they are not 500 feet away from the Normannia, on the way down.

A big black steam yacht, with a yellow funnel, was one of the mysterious ones. She came suddenly from nowhere in particular, ran around aimlessly in the Lower Bay, came up, cruised in and out among the steamships, steamed up to the head of the fleet, the City of New-York, turned and came back slowly, and then stopped altogether and lay in the channel till darkness hid her from view.

The mate of the Richard Courtney unwittingly committed an infraction of the Quarantine laws by rowing ashore after his vessel was anchored in Quarantine before she had been boarded by the Health Officer. But when he explained that the captain was deadly sick and that he wanted help, he was excused. The Richard Courtney came from Vera Cruz, and was twenty-five days out. She had a clean bill of health from the Consul at Vera Cruz. The captain was found to be suffering from a severe diarrhoeal disease.

Dr. Hamilton, ex-Surgeon-General, took another trip down the bay on the tug Manhattan. He has been spending much time among the quarantined plague-ships and the hospital islands during the last three days.

The laying of the telegraph wire to Hoffman and Swinburne Islands has not yet been finished. Its completion is awaited with much anxiety for at present no news from Lower Quarantine reaches the Upper Bay except by boat.

Richard Croker visited Quarantine again yesterday. For him, though his occupation is nominally only that of a private American citizen without any office or special prerogative, there are apparently no such things as guarantine laws. The steam yacht goes among the quarantined shipping, she goes down the Lower Bay, she ties up at the Quarantine pier, which is crime for any other vessel to do, and the men on guard bow obsequiously and clear away the rope, for, as one of them said last night: "Look at the feline, larrge, juicy poll the man has."

The arrival of the big steamship City of New-York was awaited with much interest on account of the many prominent people who were on board, and when her three black and white funnels appeared above the horizon there was a general shout of "There she is." She was not stopped at Lower Quarantine, but came forging up the bay and through the Narrows, passing all the other quarantined vessels, and saluted by cheers from all of them. She anchored ahead of the fleet about half a mile north of Quarantine. She was met by the Revenue Cutter U. S. Grant, which steamed down the upper bay early in the morning with the revenue flag flying from her stern. On board were Secretary Foster, of the Treasury Department, and a party of friends. They were saluted by the guns of Governor's Island when they passed.

The Grant steamed alongside the big City of New-York, and Secretary Foster obtained permission to speak to his wife, who was on board the big steamship. She was delighted at being met by him, and her pleasure was increased when she learned that she, with the other cabin passengers would probably be released to-day. For a time spirited conversation was carried on between the people on the two vessels.

In the meantime the steamboat William G. Edgerton was steaming around the big ship. On her was a party of New-York Central Railroad officials. She was not allowed to touch the City of New-York or even to land at the Quarantine Pier. Chauncey M. Depew sent his compliments to Dr. Jenkins and regretted that he could not have the pleasure of delivering them personally. Dr. Jenkins was just going off on the tug E. S. Atwood with Police Commissioners Martin and McClave and Superintendent Byrnes, and he sent back expressions of regret and promised to release Mr. Depew and his fellow passengers as soon as possible. When Superintendent Byrnes was asked what was going on at the Lower Bay he said that he understood that cholera germs came through the mouth and he proposed to keep his mouth shut.

Dr. Tallmadge boarded the ship at once. He carefully inspected the steerage passengers as soon as he got on board. They were lined up and carefully examined. There were 427 of them, and the
