GENERAL MARKET REPORT.

New-York, June 28, 1893.

COTTON—The New-York cotton market was only moderately active to-day, and its course was run without the occurrence of any important features. Business started off about two points higher, and during the forenoon dropped off about six points and then rallied to 7.81 and at noon sold at 7.85. One of the features of to-day was the liberal exchanges of July for the later months, mostly August, September and December. Liverpool, though not materially changed, had some influence on our market, which is still very sensitive to the course of the foreign market. The takings of spinners were increased somewhat, the sales being 10,000 bales, with a hardening market, though prices were unchanged, middling uplands being quoted at 7⅞ 16d. Futures closed steady at a net advance of 1@1½-32d. Manchester was quiet and steady for yarns, with cloths dull. The trading was mostly local, some shorts covering. There was some manipulation of July and August, with the evident purpose of getting holders of the former month to let go their July and take August at wide differences.
