JOHN JAY'S LETTERS.

THE CORRESPONDENCE AND PUBLIC PAPERS OF JOHN JAY. 1794-1826. Edited by Henry P. Johnston. Vol. IV. Large 8vo., pp. 532. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

A sumptuous edition of this valuable work is completed with the fourth volume. As only a limited number of copies have been printed, these volumes will not have wide circulation, but they will find their natural place on the shelves of public libraries and in every complete collection of books relating to American history. In these days of literary condensation, when the book stores are overstocked with outline histories and comprehensive studies of epochs, such a work cannot be read without a sense of refreshment and recreation. It contains in detail the correspondence of one of the most distinguished figures of the Revolutionary period, and reveals the dignity and quaint stateliness of his private and public relations with men of his time. There are few explanatory notes, and the editor's hand is judiciously concealed. The letters are arranged in chronological order, and printed in large type, with wide margins. It is an edition for book lovers of refined taste and elegant leisure, rather than for a workaday world. The letters explain themselves, and reveal the nobility and purity of the writer's character and the graces of old-time courtesy and friendship in public life.

The fourth volume is largely occupied with correspondence respecting the negotiations which resulted in the treaty of 1794. The sympathies of the American colonists, who had gained their independence, were divided between France and Great Britain in the foreign complications arising from the revolutionary movement, and Washington, after issuing a proclamation of neutrality, intrusted Mr. Jay with the delicate duty of averting war with England. He was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to Great Britain while he was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and was commissioned to obtain an equitable and satisfactory settlement of all grievances and controversies between the two countries. Nearly all the public papers relating to this mission are collected in this volume, and these are supplemented by his private correspondence with English and American friends. After the negotiation of the treaty he returned to America, having declined an appointment as Minister Resident in London. He was welcomed with popular acclamation, and was elected Governor of New-York. His closing years were passed in retirement at his farm in Bedford, where his health gradually failed. Selections from his correspondence while he was at Albany and in retirement are made with painstaking care and excellent judgment. While less important as a contribution to history than his letters in and from England, they reveal the wide range of his sympathies, the maturity of his judgment on public affairs, and the depth of his religious convictions.

Gouverneur Morris was the most entertaining letter-writer of his day in America, when correspondence was studied as an art and conducted with rigorous regard for form and propriety. At a time when all his contemporaries were overshadowed by the seriousness of political responsibility and social etiquette he wrote with mercurial humor, cynical frankness and sparkling vivacity. But not even Gouverneur Morris ventured to take any liberties with John Jay. One of the shortest letters in this collection is from him and contains a request that his venerable friend should be one of the godfathers of his new-born boy. "True it is," he added, "that according to the usual course you may not be able to perform the duties of that office; but, my friend, should you be mingled with the dust he shall learn from the history of your life that a man must be truly pious to be truly great." The religious faith which impressed Gouveneur Morris is an undertone running through John Jay's correspondence. Never ostentatiously or offensively displayed, it was the motive of his public career. It found unaffected expression in his affectionate letters to his wife, in which his faith in divine protection and his thankfulness for many blessings are invariably recorded. It drew from him in correspondence with William Wilberforce and many of his closest friends the most positive avowals of his belief in the Bible, which had been assailed by Paine, and the most practical evidences of humility, charity and loving kindness.

Jay's letters, like Washington's, are stately and formal. They are always dignified and serious and never flippant or playful. In reading them one wonders whether he ever found anything in the world to laugh at, or whether in the privacy of home he ever relaxed the solemnity of his manner or in the hours of retirement ceased to regard the tendencies of public affairs at home or abroad with statesmanlike caution and apprehension. Always intensely serious and never by any chance forgetting the dignity of correspondence, he was modest and simple in manner and invariably thoughtful and reasonable.
