THE TRIAL INTERRUPTED.

tacant admission that in 1884 his father had failed, and as the result of an embarrassment that had its origin in a relation with the Manhattan Beach Hotel, and that, becoming subsequently deranged as a result of brooding on these misfortunes, his father was confined in Bloomingdale Asylum for a few months. The son claimed that he had since then been entirely well, and that it was not supposed that any trace of mental weakness or disorder remained with him.

REMOVED IN AN AMBULANCE.

The physicians gave Mr. Low a dose of whiskey and applied cracked ice to his head. He recovered from his faint, but almost immediately lapsed into a mental aberration which continued in a more or less acute way until he was removed in a Chambers Street Hospital ambulance. The physicians reported to the Judge that there was no possibility of the juror being able to take his seat at once, nor did they hold out any strong hopes that he would be able to do so at all. There being no difference of opinion on these points, Judge Barrett summoned the District-Attorney and Mr. Brooke to his desk and conferred with them. Nothing was said about the possibility of a mistrial, but Mr. Brooke hinted at the grave doubt in his mind as to whether the juror had been at any time yesterday, not to speak of earlier occasions, in such possession of his senses as to enable him properly to appreciate the evidence. From Mr. Brooke's point of view, there may have been good ground for this suspicion. This juror had asked a number of searching questions of some of the witnesses, from the form of which it was possible to infer that his mind had been operating against the prisoner at the bar. The memory of these questions may have been lingering in Mr. Brooke's mind when he hinted that the juror might not have been fully alive to the significance of the testimony.

It is remarkable how strokes of luck or providence or epilepsy seem to favor Mr. Brooke in desperate emergencies. Precisely this same incident occurred during the trial of Buchanan. In that case the juror recovered, but Mr. Brooke made the incident a strong ground of appeal. In the notorious Sire breach of promise case, Mr. Brooke appearing for the fair complainant, a juror went wrong and the case was abandoned; and at a subsequent trial Mr. Brooke obtained $25,000 damages for his client. What there is in his eloquence that is especially deadly to jurors is difficult to say. The bolt that struck Mr. Low was contained in the words, "This was a foul, deliberate perjury!" But they were not delivered with any undue force and they appeared to be directed against Muller, the informer, and not against Juror Low. The relation between Mr. Brooke's oratory and the exhaustion of jurors is one which it might perhaps be proper to refer to those dreaded investigators against whom Mr. Brooke and his associates in the defence of Meyer have inveighed so bitterly, Mr. Julien, of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, and the Pinkerton detectives.

It was stipulated in the conference of the Court with the attorneys, that if possible the trial should proceed to-day, but it was plain that nobody had much hope, or the defence much desire to see it do so. Judge Barrett dismissed the jury, cautioning them that the position of things was precisely that which had obtained at the adjournment of court on Friday; that they were not to read about the case nor discuss it, but were to attend to-day, prepared to listen to the arguments of counsel and charge of the Court, precisely as if no incident had occurred to interrupt their consideration of the case.

MR. BROOKE'S SPEECH FOR THE DEFENCE.

Mr. Brooke's speech in behalf of the defendant had not risen, when he was interrupted, above the level of an ordinary address in an ordinary case. He had the benefit of a fine audience. The courtroom was crowded with people who presented a most intelligent appearance and who listened with great attention to the argument. But at no time did Mr. Brooke come to the only real point on which, with such a defence, he can ever hope to hang a jury, much less to get a verdict. This is the point that the actual acts of murder, as alleged, were witnessed by nobody except Kirfel, and that the testimony on this one vital point is wholly uncorroborated; and that all the evidence of the prosecution is consistent with a mere scheme of fraud, which accidentally went beyond, in its consequences, the point intended by those engaged in it. After all has been said that can be in favor of this point, it is still rather thin and intangible, but it is all the defence has, and it seems strange that Mr. Brooke was so long coming to it. Undoubtedly, for he knows his business well, he was reserving it for the close of his address. His efforts up to the time when he was interrupted were directed to the creation of a prejudice in the minds of the jury against the prosecution, because of the alleged appearance in the case of the Mutual Life Insurance Company and the Pinkerton detectives. As a matter of fact, neither the company nor the detectives have appeared in the case at all, except where Mr. Brooke lugged them in for the very purpose of creating this prejudice. No Pinkerton man was a witness for the prosecution. Neither was Mr. Julien, the Mutual Life operator, to whose investigations the discovery of Meyer's crime and his capture are to be credited. The only Mutual Life witness who was called at all was put on the stand to prove that Meyer and Mrs. Meyer had attempted to collect the insurance, just as witnesses from other companies were called for the same purpose. The District-Attorney, for obvious reasons, has kept the insurance company and the Pinkerton men in the remote background, but for reasons equally obvious Mr. Brooke has pulled them into the open. He was quite dramatic when, having slashed the company, he spoke of the omnipresent quality of the alert Mr. Julien. Mr. Julien was here, said Mr. Brooke, on such a day. He was there on such another. He was present at the bribing of Muller; he was present at the betrayal of Meyer. "He was on hand at the autopsy. At every important point in the preparation of the prosecution's case when anything emergent was to be done, there always was Mr. Julien, with the $175,000,000 of Mutual Life Insurance capital, which so impressed the Assistant District-Attorney, always at his back. He has been present at every session of this trial. There now he sits, there, there! You see him, gentlemen of the jury, and you have seen him everywhere in this prosecution, everywhere except yonder in that witness chair. They did not put him there. They did not dare to do it." Mr. Julien, who is a handsome, intelligent young gentleman, sat bravely in front of Mr. Brooke's aggressive forefinger, without turning a muscle. He was apparently of the opinion that he could stand it if the orator could.

Mr. Brooke turned his attention to Kirfel. He went over the informer's odious history, endeavoring with great zeal to paint black blacker. He said that the law was gradually coming to take a proper view of the evidence of an accomplice; that there was a time when it was practically necessary to believe an accomplice's story; but that the use of informers in prosecutions was a relic of barbarism, and belonged to the time of the thumbscrew, the wheel, the rack and the torture-chamber. He congratulated the jury that the time was coming when the well-worn excuse of prosecuting officers, that it was necessary for them to get evidence wherever evidence could be found, would not avail them in committing the public to the shame of such acts of bribery as had been perpetrated in order to bring Muller on this witness stand with his elaborate story, learned by heart for the edification of a jury of honest men. Mr. Brooke was pointing out that by the perjuries of Kirfel the money had been obtained on such life insurance policies as Meyer had succeeded in collecting. And it was at this point that he paused in his address to inquire into the distress of the seventh juror.

L. E. Q.

POSSIBLY A MISTRIAL.

THE ILLNESS OF MR. LOW MAY CAUSE MUCH TROUBLE.

OPINIONS OF THOSE INTERESTED IN THE CASE —THE REPORT OF THE PHYSICIANS NOT YET MADE.

When it became known yesterday in the corridors and through the halls of the Court of Oyer and Terminer that Alexander B. Low, one of the jurors on the Meyer murder case, had become suddenly insane, crowds gathered inside and outside the building. When the ambulance from Chambers Street Hospital drew up outside of the building the crowd grew and the excitement increased. The most absurd rumors began to circulate. One of these was that the prisoner had attempted suicide; another that the Judge had suddenly been taken ill, and still another that Mrs. Meyer had swallowed some carbolic acid and was on the point of death. Tammany leaders and Tammany heelers and Tammany henchmen, who help to obstruct the passageways in this public building six days in the week playing politics at the expense of the taxpayers, stopped to see what was the cause of the commotion. It was believed for a time that some Anarchist, taking example from his companions in Barcelona and Paris, had hurled a bomb among the spectators, and the wild and unearthly yells of Low from his place in the clerk's chambers, which could be heard half a block away, lent for a brief season some color to the suspicion.

Archibald Low, the sick juror's son, who is about eighteen years old, was by his father's side while the physicians were attending to him, and insisted on accompanying him to Bellevue Hospital in the ambulance. He was anxious to have him taken to his home, No. 318 West Eighty-fourth-st., directly from the court, but it was pointed out by the man in charge of the ambulance that it was not usual to convey a man such a distance in an ambulance unless to an hospital, reasonable radius only being the circuit within which this kindly office was supposed to be discharged. Besides the District-Attorney insisted that the hospital was the proper place for the man at that particular moment, until at least Dr. Carlos F. MacDonald and Dr. Charles L. Dana, the two physicians appointed by Judge Barrett, had examined Mr. Low and pronounced upon his condition and the nature of the illness by which he had been attacked. Dr. O'Sullivan, one of the lawyers for the defence, who was doing all he could to relieve the stricken juryman, agreed to this arrangement. Meanwhile Low was shouting and gesticulating in a wild and violent way, and uttering broken and disconnected sentences in a shrill and piercing voice. He kicked hard and tried to get up from the lounge, and it took several of the other jurors, who had left the box when the court was adjourned and went into the room where Low was, to keep him quiet. At last he was secured in the ambulance and whirled away.

Late in the evening the reporter saw Dr. Douglas, one of the physicians in the hospital, and inquired what had been done in regard to the sick juror.

"You must not ask me anything about that," said he.

"What report have the doctors made upon his condition?"

"Nor about that," he answered.

"Well, is he insane?"

"Nor that, either."

"Now," continued the reporter, desperately, "Is Juror Low here at all?"

"Juror Low is here," said the doctor, "and Juror Low is sick; that's all that I can say."

"Have Dr. Macdonald and Dr. Dana examined him?"

"Dr. Macdonald has been here and examined the man, but Dr. Dana has not been here. Since his admission Low has been raving a good deal about the trial, but he is nowise violent."

"And will be all right soon?" suggested the reporter.

Dr. Douglas winked knowingly, smiled and was silent.

The next place where information was sought was at Mr. Low's home. It is a cosy frame building bordering on the Riverside Drive. The family consists of his wife, two daughters and two sons. His wife was prostrated by the news, and refused to see any stranger, but Archibald, the son, was communicative enough. He refused to affirm or deny the report that it was losses in connection with the big Rockaway Beach hotel, in which his father had had some interest, that brought on his illness nine years ago, but he did not deny that he was insane in 1884, and had been confined in Bloomingdale. From other sources it was learned that Mr. Low was confined in that institution as far back as 1868, his commitment stating that he was suffering from hallucination.

"Is it a fact that you were in attendance at the court every day during the trial, expecting some such occurrence?" the reporter asked.

"I was present most of the time," Archibald answered, "and I thought it not unlikely my father might get ill."

De Lancy Nicoll, when seen at his home, was much put out over the matter, and said that he feared the labor and expense of the trial had all gone for nothing, and that it certainly looked as though the man was insane.

"In which case there will have to be a new trial?" suggested the reporter.

"That is about the sum and substance of it," was Mr. Nicoll's reply.

"Have you received the report of the medical experts?"

"I have not, and I do not expect it will be submitted until the morning."

Judge Barrett was poring over some books in the library in his apartments in the Osborne flats when asked if he had received the report. He said that he had not, and that it would not be made known until to-day. "It is most unfortunate," he said, "that this mishap should have occurred just at the close of a long and arduous trial."

"If it be found that he was ill, but not insane, what then?"

"We can keep the matter in abeyance until he recovers, and then continue the work as though nothing had happened. When it came to my knowledge after he had been sworn as a juror, and when the case was about to be opened, that Mr. Low had been insane I talked with him for more than fifteen minutes, and he denied that such had ever been the case."

"If the experts report him insane, what then?"

"Then, unfortunately, as I said before, there will have to be a new trial. It will be a difficult matter to secure another jury, for nearly every one has read the details of the trial, and that would disqualify them from serving."

Assistant District-Attorney McIntyre, like Mr. Nicoll, seemed sorry at the turn of affairs. "So much time and labor and money wasted," said he, "and now probably a mistrial. It is too bad!"

"If it is some illness other than insanity," the reporter said, "and that he does not recover until after the New Year, how then?"

"I suppose," Mr. McIntyre answered, "that the incoming District-Attorney would allow Mr. Nicoll to sum up as though no change of administration had occurred in the office."

Dr. Carlos F. Macdonald, when seen at the Hotel Cambridge late in the evening, said that he had examined Low, but had not so far made his report. He said he could not inform anybody until Judge Barrett had possession of it.

BROWN-SEQUARD AND WILLIAMS

THE LATTER CURES A PARALYTIC—IS THIS THE SUPREME TEST?—THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS CASE AND ITS BEARING ON THE LESSER NERVE DISEASES.

From The Troy (N. Y.) Times.

It is not often that a discovery in medicine is made the subject of special mention by the newspapers in this age. There is one which perhaps may, however, with greater propriety than any other be accorded the privilege. The physician who made this discovery is a Canadian and his name has been brought into much prominence in this vicinity of late through a case in the neighboring town of Lansingburg. We cite this case because it is near at home and represents as severe a test as could be had. It is that of F. C. Kimball, of 186 Second avenue, who has been a paralytic for three years and who was cured by the medicine known as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. His was that particular form known as Locomotor Ataxia, a nerve disease pronounced by the regular schools as incurable. In this disease the nerves of the back and head which govern the lower limbs become completely and, as supposed, forever helpless. In Kimball's case he not only could not move his lower limbs, but his legs were as hard as wood and as lifeless.

Kimball's physicians at Rochester, where he once lived, Drs. Lee and Spencer, said he had Locomotor Ataxia. Others who treated him said the same. All medical works pronounced his disease incurable. The Rensselaer County Medical Society, whose representatives have examined him since his cure, and who recently made an exhaustive report on his case, also said he had had Locomotor Ataxia, and pronounced his restoration a wonderful one.

The deduction from this discussion is this: If chemistry has given us in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a preparation which can so build up the nerves of a patient as to bring him from total disability and hopelessness back to health and strength, every man, woman and child in the world should know it. As it is, druggists are selling them in large quantities here since Kimball's case was first published. This case will interest the medical fraternity at large, as it did the Rensselaer County Medical Society.
