WEST VIRGINIANS DINE.

ANNUAL DINNER OF THE CHARLESTOWN SOCIETY.

ERASTUS WIMAN, ONE OF ITS GUESTS, SAYS THE UNITED STATES SHOULD CHERISH AND ENFORCE THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

The seventh annual reunion and dinner of the Charlestown Society of the City of New-York was held last evening at the Arena, in West Thirty-first-st., near Broadway. The society has about sixty-five members, all of whom came from the little village of Charlestown, in the Shenandoah Valley in West Virginia. The roll of members contains the names of many of the rising young men of the city. About seventy-five men sat down to the dinner last night, this number including about a dozen guests.

Prominent among these was Erastus Wiman, who, as a guest of Charles Broadway Rouss, one of the society's prominent members, spoke on "Men from Virginia." This was his first appearance as a public speaker since his vindication by the courts.

Mr. Wiman responded to the invitation of the West Virginians because of the opportunity it afforded him to make an acknowledgment of his obligation to Mr. Rouss, who had gone on his bond for $60,000.

Mr. Wiman said that, as a British subject and especially as a native of Britain's largest and nearest colony, occupying the greater half of this continent on which further aggression by England was forbidden by the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine, it was hardly to be expected that he could at first blush advocate it. Yet the sober second thought about which one now hears so much had brought him to the conclusion that there was no principle for which the United States could more righteously contend, and there was no danger which this free people might not incur to enforce it. But in that enforcement there need not be conflict with Great Britain. If the English people were right in their contention, England wanted no more than she was entitled to, on the one hand, and on the other the United States was willing that all she was entitled to should be awarded to her. The Commission now appointed would certainly reach a conclusion that England was right in demanding all she claimed, and, reaching that conclusion, the United States would withdraw her interference with honor to herself, because out of jealous regard to the right of a weak sister in the family of republics she had intervened. If it should, however, be disclosed that England had made a mistake, it would quickly be recognized by that nation, even though the mistake was brought to her knowledge by her eldest offspring, and the peaceful means of arbitration would forever set the limits that England would seek to occupy. It might be difficult to justify the belligerent attitude of the President in a moment of profound peace; it might be almost as difficult to justify the refusal of Lord Salisbury to settle a subtle claim in a remote wilderness by the simple means of reference to disinterested friends. But intelligent and comprehensive investigation as proposed by the United States was certainly the only way in which to beget the removal of all cause of difference between two nations so bound up together that they cannot fight where one only wants what it is entitled to and the other is ready to grant it.

The other toasts were "Our Society," by E. P. Kennedy, the president and toastmaster; "A Voice from Home," by William H. Travers; "Our History—Chapter 7," by J. Ashby Beall; "The Ills of the Poet," by Anson A. Gard; "Things in General," by Thomas J. L. McManus; "Our Only Requisite for Success—an Opportunity," by William de H. Washington, and "The Monroe Doctrine," by J. Calvin McKnight.

Among those present at the dinner were Charles A. Deshon, John C. Harrigan, I. J. Beaudrias, Lester B. Howe, Dr. W. F. Edwards, Andrew S. Hammersley, jr., Samuel H. Hoey, Frederick J. Moses, Edward T. Heyd, Carroll Miller, William Campbell, Ernest Jerrold and John H. Story, who were all guests of the society. The others were Charles Alexander, Charles Ambler, A. S. Baird, T. A. Beall, T. D. Beall, J. H. Beall, Abbott Bentley, E. Brownold, Thomas D. Campbell, Roger Chew, W. W. Cochrane, Harvey Dorsey, C. A. Darlington, Stuart Hirschman, Bassett W.
