Stock Prices Rise in Final 1922 Session

Attention Concentrated on More Volatile Stocks; Primarily Market Is of a Professional Character

Traders entered upon the closing session of 1922 in the security markets yesterday apparently determined to establish as the point of departure for the new year a basis of good cheer. A little cash selling remained to be done, but this was not in sufficient volume to deter the purpose of the moment and when the closing gong sounded, it terminated a short trading period in which the spirit of speculation for the rise was rampant.

It was still a market made by professional operators and such being the case concentration of attention upon the more volatile stocks, pool favorites and others, was inevitable. Within this limitation, buying was broadly spread, oil, railroad, copper, automobile and other groups moving to higher levels. As stocks were bought for their speculative rather than their investment attributes, it could not have been expected that the bond division of trading would develop buoyance, but fair activity and a general firmness was remarked here.

To attribute the rise to particular causes would be superfluous; nevertheless, a constructive basis was to hand if resort to it had been necessary. The outline of the Administration's attitude toward Europe by Secretary of State Hughes, carrying the suggestion of a non-political expert treatment of Germany's problem, was in itself a commanding factor in engendering optimism. Further, there was the marking up of Pennsylvania crude somewhat in advance of schedule and there appeared in the crop of business forecasts a genuine note of confidence rather than a forced effort to make the best of things, to pick out the silver lining.

The foreign exchange market experienced a normal Saturday and cannot be said to have measured the influence of the Hughes declaration. Quotations were generally firm, a rise in francs being the most important change.

Activity in the wheat pit partly atoned for the absence of trading in other commodities. The December option moved with especial violence, breaking 4½ cents after advancing 1¼ cent and finishing ½ cent net lower. Other options firmed on expert business during the late session and closed ¼ to 1¼ cent higher.

The Dollar in Foreign Exchange

Foreign exchange rates worked slightly higher yesterday, sterling closing the year at a substantial gain over rates at the start of 1922. Important recoveries from midweek also were made in the last day or two. Changes made during the week, however, were small.

If you calculate the cost of the dollar in terms of foreign money or currency exchange value—that is, if you were buying a dollar with pounds, marks or francs—its value yesterday, compared with last week and the corresponding date of a year ago follows:

	Yesterday.	Week ago.	Year ago.
