SIDNEY GREY,

A TALE OF

SCHOOL LIFE.

By the Author of "Ella and Charlie."

Foster's odd manner had made him suspicious, and as soon as his companion had left the house, he went into the shop in search of some one who could satisfy his mind that he had not been cheated. Wycombe was very fond of money, and having a vague idea that his mind was not as strong as his body, he had a great horror of being over-reached in a bargain. His father did not happen to be in the shop, and as he was retreating to look for him elsewhere, he met his mother, who, seeing the note in his hand, made him explain to her how it came into his possession. Mrs. Wycombe was a very careful woman, and she long thought that her husband indulged his son with a little more money than was at all good for him. She felt extremely scandalized at the sight of the five-pound note, and without condescending to listen to Wycombe's history, decided that he was not fit to keep it. After listening to a long scolding, Wycombe was glad to retreat; and Mrs. Wycombe, having captured the note, put it carefully by in her own purse till she should have time to show it to her husband, and lecture him on his over-indulgence, and his son's extravagant habits.

Foster in the mean time made the best of his way home, by no means in the most tranquil state of mind. It was late when he come in.—The names had all been called over, and his sent up to the Doctor. There would be another imposition to add to the long arrears of work which his idleness and inattention had accumulated. He heard the news with a sulky sort of indifference, and was turning away, when the boy who had given it to him followed it up with another remark scarcely less welcome.

"Lyon wants to speak to you in the class-room. I fancy it's something particular. You had better go at once."

It now always made Foster nervous to hear that any one wanted to speak to him, and his heart beat quickly as he opened the class-room door. Lyon was there alone, attentively examining a drawing that lay before him on the table. He looked up when Foster came in, but there was nothing at all formidable in his first remark: it was only, "So you were not in the drawing-class this afternoon?"

"No more were you," said Foster, much relieved.

"I was," said Lyon.

"Oh! I thought you could not possibly get back in time: I did not. But pray did you send for me in here to call me to account for shirking my drawing-lesson? I think you might have left that for the Doctor."

"Quite willingly," said Lyon. "Dr. Wise walked through the class this afternoon, and inquired affectionately after you; that's your own affair. I sent for you, as you are such a great artist, to ask you what you think of this drawing."

Foster took the drawing carelessly from Lyon's hand; but when he had glanced at it, he dropped it again, with an exclamation of surprise.

"You know it, then?" said Lyon.

"It's the—it's exactly like the drawing Sidney Grey did for the medal," said Foster, stammering.

"It is the drawing," said Lyon, pointing to a little "S. G." in the corner.

"How did it come here?" said Foster, looking at the cardboard, as if it had appeared mysteriously on purpose to confront him.

"Nothing very wonderful in that," said Lyon, drily. "Mr. Ross gave it to me to copy this afternoon, and he hired it of Sands, the stationer; and he, I have no doubt, bought it of Sidney Grey."

"Bought it!" said Foster, contemptuously. "I've heard they are very poor. I believe their father is a bankrupt, or something——"

"No affair of ours," said Lyon.

"What did you bring me here and make all this fuss for then?" said Foster. "I am sure I care nothing about Sidney Grey, or his drawings, or his affairs. I never wish to hear more of them."

"Very likely not," said Lyon; "but I have something to say about this drawing that I must trouble you to hear. It was not among the other drawings when Mr. Ross's brother and the artist from London examined them to decide about the medal. Ross has just told me that he saw all the drawings before the other two came into the room, and that it was not among them. If it had been there yours would not have gained the prize. Somehow or other it was not shown with the rest, though I myself saw Grey give it in."

Foster listened quietly to the end of Lyon's speech, and then to ours out, it was really quite relief to be able to be a little indignant, to have a false charge brought against him—he had been expecting something different.

"So," he said, in an indignant tone, "you suspect me, I see, of having prevented this drawing from being shown? I don't like you, Lyon. You have been wishing to fasten a charge against me; but I can tell you, you never were more mistaken in your life. Grey took away his drawing himself; I saw him with my own eyes."

"You saw him," said Lyon.

"Yes, I tell you I did," said Foster.

"But where did he take it from?"

"From the study, the very evening we gave them all in. I saw him take it away, and I it seems he put it in portfolio in the morning of his own. It is strange, though."

"You saw him, the evening, take it from the study?" said Lyon, again.

"Yes, yes" said Foster, eagerly. "I am ready to give you my word of honor, or anything you like."

"Oh no! never mind," said Lyon; "your word of honor makes no difference; you've said quite enough. Give me back the drawing. I've got it to copy. You need not stay any longer here; you've told me all I wanted to know."

Lyon's eyes sparkled with pleasure, and he hummed a tune to himself as he walked away to take his place at the tea-table. Foster followed slowly, puzzled and dismayed—he scarcely knew why. The sight of the drawing had disturbed him so much, that he could scarcely conceal his uneasiness from his companions during the rest of the evening. He had no idea that he had said anything to betray himself. His mind was too anxious, too full of the thought, to make him a very close observer of others; he had a kind of superstitious feeling that something would be always rising up to remind him of his falsehood, and the events of this day had done much to confirm it. Uneasy thoughts kept him awake, or disturbed his sleep with restless dreams, until the first dawn of light, streaming through the window of his sleeping-room, reminded him of his engagement with Wycombe. Every one else in the room was fast asleep, and Foster found no difficulty in creeping noiselessly from his room, and letting himself down into the garden, as he and Wycombe had arranged, from a small staircase window, which had before been used for the same purpose on other occasions, and for which Dr. Wise had been talking of having shutters made ever since he came to the school. The fresh, clear morning air and the excitement of the adventure, raised Foster's spirits, and helped him to smother his fears and his remorse for a short time longer.

CHAPTER XVII.

OUT OF BOUNDS.

"Well," said Wycombe, as he was taking his rod to pieces, and looking with complacency at some newly-caught fish that lay on the grass beside him, "I must say we have had a jolly good morning. It is worth while getting up early for such fun as this."

"Yes," said Foster, who had been less fortunate in his sport; "but I wish, Wycombe, that you would move a little faster. You don't consider how late it is getting."

"Time enough," said Wycombe. "Where is the use of being in a hurry? I never am."

"No, indeed," said Foster; "you are the most selfish fellow I ever saw. So long as you are in no danger of getting into trouble yourself you don't care what becomes of your friends."

Wycombe made no answer to this compliment, but began deliberately to wipe the joints of his fishing-rod, and to arrange and re-arrange the fish in his basket.

Foster saw that nothing was to be gained by losing his temper. "Come" he said, changing his tone, "I was only in fun. I know you are as good natured as any one at the bottom, and would be the very last to fail a friend. Only think what trouble I shall be in if we don't get back before the bell rings."

"There's plenty of time, I tell you," said Wycombe, pawing stupidly; and Foster, who felt that he was entirely in his companion's power, was obliged to swallow his impatience during a slow walk up to the farm, and a long delay that followed while Wycombe displayed the fish he had caught to the farmer's wife, and boasted of his own success, and gloried over Foster.

"What a bore it is to have to do with selfish people!" thought Foster; and he began to ask himself whether the pleasure of sitting on the damp grass for two hours, watching Wycombe catch fish, was not rather dearly purchased by the agonies of impatience he was suffering now.

"You need not stand there, looking like a thunder-cloud," said Wycombe, at last. "We are waiting for Jackson. He has driven in the pig to the common to look at some sheep, and it will behalf an hour before he can come back. You may as well take it quietly. I am going into the house to have some breakfast."

Three quarters of an hour passed while Wycombe regaled himself with eggs, bacon, fresh bread, and new milk; and Foster, unable to touch anything, fretted and fumed himself into a fever of anxiety. At last the gig wheels were heard in the yard; and Wycombe, who had now eaten as much as he could possibly swallow, declared that he was quite ready to start, and discovered suddenly that it was later than he expected. But now another cause of delay arose. The man, who had caught sight of the eggs and bacon as he drove up to the open door, stoutly declared that he was not going to set off home without his breakfast. His young master might be in a hurry, he said, but he was not; and his old master was too reasonable to expect any one to be out so many hours without eating. It was now Wycombe's turn to feel impatient and fly into a passion; but his anger was too common a thing to be much regarded by his father's servant. He did not trouble himself to make any further reply, but quietly hung the reins on a post in the yard, and entered the house with a very leisurely step.

"I say," said Foster, when the door was shut after him, "it would serve that fellow right if we were to get into the gig and drive home, and leave him to walk after us."

"So it would," said Wycombe; "but who would drive?"

"Why you, of course," said Foster; "you could drive."

"Of course, I could," said Wycombe, who had been boasting of his accomplishments the whole way they came.

"Jump in, then. It is a shame that we should be kept waiting by a servant;" a butcher's man, Foster was on the point of saying; but he remembered in time that it would not do to insult Wycombe just then.

Wycombe felt a little qualm of conscience. He knew very well that his father never allowed him to drive, and that he had really very little experience in the management of horses. But then it would be so mortifying to make such a confession after all his boasting; and what danger could there be? After a moment's hesitation he disengaged the reins, and got into the gig with Foster.

"Let me have the whip," said Foster, seizing it "I'll touch the horse up; we've no time to lose."

"Don't," shouted Wycombe, nervously; but it was too late. Foster had given the spirited horse a sharp cut across the neck, and, tossing its head up in the air, it set off at full speed, dashing through the yard gates, and grazing the wheel against the postern with a jar that almost sent the two boys over in the road.

"I say, I say," said Wycombe, pulling at the reins so hard that he lost breath to finish his sentence.

"This is what I call going capitally," said Foster, "only it shakes one a little. You could not keep more in the middle of the road, could you? I say, we are going faster and faster. Why, we are nearly in the ditch! Oh! oh! oh! I shall be shaken to pieces! Why don't you pull them in?"

"Hold your tongue, you fool!" said Wycombe, who had presence of mind to go on pulling.

"Is he—do you think he is—Oh!—running away?" cried Foster. "Stop him! stop him! Oh! some one stop him!"

They were passing another carriage when Foster called out, and his frantic cries, and the sound of horse hoofs behind him, excited the runaway horse to the highest pitch. He broke into a furious gallop, and Wycombe, finding all attempts to check him vain, threw the reins on his neck, and sunk back on his seat in despair.
