LEOLA;

OR

THE MYSTERIOUS RANGER.

A Tale of the Mexican War.

By T. Hamilton Vananda.

Author of "Abola," "The Bitter ... Patriot," "Wild Hermit," "Almond," "Jessie Wharton," ...

There was a silence of some moments, during which Mariano manifested considerable nervousness.

"I see you are dying to ask me a question," said Travis, smiling at her anxiety. "The new guest that will stop at the Posada, some time to-day, will have a companion!"

"Is he here?" she exclaimed, almost wildly.

"He is everywhere that Jules Travis is," said he, with earnest emphasis.

Mariano felt like clapping her hands, and dancing a minuet, but a sign from Travis restrained her.

"Tell your mistress that I am here—that I have come to save her, and when saved this once,—she will no longer need fear her enemies. Tell her I will be near her in all hours of danger, but to seek no interview, and on no account recognize me. It may be weeks, months ere I can accomplish all my purposes, but they will surely be accomplished. Be wary, and—remember!"

He turned, and walked hastily away, while Mariano, full of contending emotions, stood gazing after him. Presently as if starting from a dream, she darted into the bazaar, and making a few hasty purchases of fruit for her mistress, she ran, rather than walked to the hotel to communicate her news.

Poor Leola, wasted, as we have seen her on a former occasion, was overwhelmed when she heard that her guardian lover was again near her, but the restraint that his message put upon her actions, somewhat dampened the ardor of her joy. Still she was happy, and embraced and kissed her servant as a reward for bringing her the intelligence.

Meanwhile Travis returned to the Posada de Carlotta, and entered the room just as Kit had awakened from his last sleep.

"Rouse thee, thou murderer of time!" he exclaimed, gaily. "Get up, for I have much to tell you."

"Then you may's well go on while I'm in this comfortable position, I reckon," said the ranger.

Travis told him of his interview with Mariano, which soon brought Kit to his feet. As Jules proceeded to unfold his information, and the plan he intended to adopt, he became deeply interested, and when he had finished, the ranger said:

"As I said afore, I never had an idee, but what I must speak it, an' it's my present idee, after mature deliberation, that you're got head enough to kerflummix the whole o' these darned Mexican conspirators.—Men, wimmin, and young cattermounts."

CHAPTER XVI.

AN OLD FRIEND. ADVENTURES.

After breakfast, Travis bade his friend remain at the hotel, while he went on a private mission. Kit did not like the idea of being left alone in a hotel, in the heart of an enemy's country, without being able to speak ten words of the language. He did not know at what moment his nativity would be discovered, and he be apprehended as a spy, and shot. But there was no alternative in the case, so he made a virtue of necessity, and ordering up a bottle of wine to his room, resolved to make the most of it.

Travis, on leaving the hotel, started toward the heart of the city, and soon entered the Grand Plaza, which he crossed, and entering one of the intersecting Avenues, proceeded toward the Belen Garita. After some ten minutes walk, he slackened his pace, as if in doubt of his locality, and finally accosted a citizen.

"Do you know, he asked, Señor Henrico Allevan, a painter, who once lived in this quarter?"

"Right well, Señor, and he still lives here, said the citizen. "There are few people in the city, that do not Señor Allevan.

"Ah? has he become so famous, then?" said Travis.

"Surely, indeed. His pictures adorn the Nacional and Arch-Episcopal palaces, and every prominent citizen of the kingdom is his patron. You will find his studio in the next block."

Thanking the citizen for his information, he proceeded onward, and soon came to a large palatial-looking building, the external appearance of which indicated that it was dedicated to Art. Ascending the broad stone steps, he entered the wide hall, on either side of which, were rooms and galleries filled with various paintings, the entrances all guarded by a sentinel. Of one of these he asked:

"Can the Señor Allevan be seen?"

The soldier looked at the humble apparel of our hero, and was about to give an insolent reply, when something in the intelligent countenance of the latter commanded his respect.

"You are too early, I think, señor, but I will try," he said.

"Tell him it is an old friend that wishes an audience," said Travis.

The sentinel left his post, and entering a side gallery disappeared. He had been gone but a few moments, when he reappeared and said:

"He will see Señor at breakfast: this way."

Travis followed him through the gallery into a suite of rooms, in the last of which was spread a morning's repast. The sentinel motioned him to a seat and retired. But a few moments elapsed, and Travis had scarce finished his observance of the elegance of his rooms, when the Artist—a young man scarce twenty-five, of handsome appearance, and wearing a long morning robe—entered the apartment. He observed Travis well, as he arose to greet him, and seemed not a little astonished to find one of his humble appearance in his private breakfast room. He paused on the threshold, as he said, with embarrassed dignity—

"Whom, Señor, have I the honor of addressing?"

"One whom you have evidently forgotten," said Travis. Then, taking off his wig, and shaking out his dark, curling locks, he said in a low, thrilling voice: "What, Henrico! have you forgotten me?"

"St. Jago! can it be?" cried the artist, starting forward. "What! my old play-mate! the son of my old benefactor!" And in a second the two young men were clasped in each other's arms.

"Why, where did you come from, and why here in this disguise? But what am I saying? Why ask questions the answer of which I can readily give? You have grown wonderful, In—"

"'sh! I am called Captain Jules Travis, of the Texan Rangers, United States Army, for the present," said our hero, interrupting him, and opening his blouse, he revealed his uniform beneath.

"One will be as dangerous as the other," said his friend, somewhat perplexed.

"For that reason I must have another, how would, Don Constance Valerio sound."

"Very well; but sit down, my friend, and give me a history of your adventures during your exile, that I may better understand your position."

They sat down to the table, and while the artist partook leisurely of his meat, Travis related to him many adventures of 'flood and field,' with a careful digest of the incidents of this story.

"All this is very marvelous," said the artist, thoughtfully, when he had concluded. "You were once opulent, your father's name a beacon in the land. I, a poor, nameless orphan, was taken by your father, and placed on the high road to fame. A turn in the wheel of fortune, and your name is one of infamy; your father is murdered, your mother sinks broken-hearted to the grave, a lovely sister is destroyed, and you, a youth of eighteen, driven forth an exile. Five years roll away, and the poor orphan boy has risen from poverty to fame and opulence; the last relic of his family returns, blighted in spirit, to avenge his wrongs! Have I stated the case clearly?"

"You have!" said Travis, bitterly.

"Well, my friend, I would attempt to advise you to forego these bold measures, did I not know it would be futile. Blood will have blood, they say, and none know its truth so well as a genuine Spaniard, like you and I. You doubtless need assistance, or you would not, probably, have come to me. There is my hand, which was never treacherous in its grasp. What can I do for you?" He extended his hand towards Travis, who shook it warmly.

"Thanks, Henrico!" he exclaimed. "I knew it would be thus. I knew that your generous heart would never close against me!"

"What! against the son of my benefactor against my old playmate, collegiate brother! S'death! Let the world go to the devil if it will, Henrico Allevan will keep himself out of his clutches. How can I serve you!" he exclaimed, with enthusiastic frankness.

"First, I want funds to carry out my plans."

"A peck of roubles, if you wish. Go on," said his friend.

"Next, I would have you procure me an outfit of cavalier's clothing for myself and respectable citizen's attire for my faithful Texan friend, of whom I spoke."

"Easily done. We are about of a size; you can don one of my suits at once until the rest are ready. It would be well, if he would have no objection, for your Texan to act as your valet, as it would be an excuse for your keeping him always near you. In that case, the livery of one of my servants, a tall mountaineer, would be the very thing.'

'I will answer for his quiescence, and thank you for the suggestion," said Travis.

"Then, since all is arranged, fall to and eat some breakfast."

"Thank you, I have breakfasted, but will take a glass of wine," said Travis. "Such delicate viands as you have here would not sit well upon a soldier's stomach, if he were to begin all at once."

The artist laughed, and led the way to his dressing room. In half an hour, Travis was dressed in the gay costume of a Spanish cavalier of wealth and station, had a sword at his side, and a pocket full of roubles.

"I feel myself once more," he said to his friend.

"And look yourself, but for your stained face," replied the artist. "That, however, is necessary, I suppose."

"Yes, for the Grey Monk already half suspects me, if he does not know all."

"We can easily baffle him and Castillias both," said the artist. "Return to your hotel, and make your arrangements for removal. I will send the costume for the Texan at once. Take up your quarters at the Nacional during the day, and this evening I will call on you. This alone will give you position, and you may be introduced to Castillias himself, without recognition."

Travis thanked his friend warmly; and taking leave, he hastened back to the Posada de Carlotta, where he found Kit anxiously awaiting him. He was considerably surprised to see the great change in his old officer's appearance, and quite delighted at the idea Travis proposed, of his acting as his valet.

"Somebody—I forget who—says suthin' about every man in his life playin' a good many parts," said the Texan. "If anybody plays more parts nor Kit Galen, then they cin wear my cast-off clothes. Fust, I'm a hunter on the Big Red, the Colerader, and the Leon; then I'm a ranger, fightin' the greasers like a Cattermount, under old 'Rough and Ready,' next, I'm a vine-dresser, comin' into the enemy's camp under difficulties, with a bad smellin' wig on my head, and my body shrunkin' up in a sailor's riggin'. Last of all—as far as my life dramer has run, which is about the fourth act, as they say at the Theayter, I'm to dress myself up in blue and green stripes, and play waiter to a Spanish gentleman, in a fashionable hotel. Wa', as variety, they say's the spice o' life, this is what I would call allspice. But it pleases me e'en a'most to death there's on'y one thing that bothers me."

"What is that?" asked Travis.

"I'm afraid Mariano wont know me in my new toggery."

"Nonsense. She will be looking out for us, and you can give her a sly hint, should she fail to recognize you. Beside, don't you see that it will enable you to court her as much as you please, without being suspected?"

"So it will 'sarn it all! I never thought o' that," said Kit, perfectly convinced.

That evening there was a distinguished arrival at the Posada Nacional. Don Constance Valerio and servant, from Cuba, had arrived via Vera Cruz, supplied with the latest intelligence from the army, and, rumor said, upon a political mission of high importance. In the evening Henrico Allevan, the celebrated artist, called upon him, and introduced our hero to several of the most prominent guests and citizens. The Don pretended to know all about the investment of Vera Cruz, and speculated largely upon the favorable chances of its surrender. The artist threw out vague hints of his friend being a secret agent of the Queen of Spain, and hoped that his mission would be fulfilled, which might have no less an effect than an alliance, offensive and defensive, with that nation. This had a wonderful effect, and before San Pedro had tolled ten, Travis was the most important person in the hotel.

On entering his sleeping apartment, after bidding his artist-friend good night, he found a letter awaiting him.

"Who gave you this, Pietro?" he asked of Kit.

"Mariano, Señor," said the ranger, falling at once into his assumed character. "She said it was from her mistress, the Señora Leolas."

"Very well, Pietro, you may retire," said Travis.

"Adois, Senor," said the ranger, bowing with mock gravity, as he left the room.

Travis clutched the missive nervously in his grasp, and pressed it fervently to his lips. It was from Leola—the first token he had received from her since their long separation. He was near her; she had doubtless seen him, herself unseen—though he had been most watchful for her face and form. He had forbidden her to recognise him, and she had written. These were his reflections, as he nervously opened the missive. It ran thus:—

Dearest Jules:

Since your position is so critical, and you have forbidden me to recognize you, I thought it best, indelicate as it may seem, to write to you for information as to my course; I mean relative to those by whom I am surrounded. Being ignorant of your plans or intentions, I am at a loss to know how to govern my actions. I have made this an excuse to write to you, dear Jules, but O! how can I dissemble intent? How can I help thanking you for again coming to my aid? And yet, I tremble, while I write, for you are in great danger. There are sharp eyes here, who will watch your every action. O Jules! be very careful and discreet! If they should penetrate your disguise, your hours would be numbered. Keep out of the way of the Grey Monk and Castillias, for the former has sharp eyes, and the latter is not lacking in shrewdness. May God protect you, dear Jules! Believe that my prayers shall ever ascend to heaven in your behalf!

Faithfully yours, LEOLA.

With this letter under his pillow, Travis laid down to sleep.
