JACK BINNACLE'S

LIGHT; OR

A Cruise to the Cannibal Islands

A Tale of Adventure in the South Pacific.

BY F. CLINTON BARRINGTON,

Author of "The Lady Imogen," "Kate Howard," "The Young Fisherman," "Fitz-Hern," "The Bride-Isabel," "Conrado de Beltran," etc.

His eyes had rested upon those clouds in the northern board—before so small, but which had increased in size so rapidly during the last few moments, that they already covered more than one half of the sky, and were constantly growing larger.

"But—that's bad!"

A tremor passed over his form, an emotion checking his steps and absorbing all other thoughts.

"Yes—bad, bad!"

He came to a halt, still looking at those clouds as if the storm they betokened was something he had not taken into account, and something for which he was not wholly prepared.

"I should not wonder—the storm is gathering so rapidly—if it prevents me from reaching the sloop. Ten thousand furies! What can I do?"

He reflected a moment in silence.

"Well," he then said, "in any case the gold is here, and the girl's here—all safe for the present—and I must get out of the difficulty in the best way I can. If I live, I shall triumph, for I'll conquer or die!"

He went on again, advancing towards the man at the wheel, while another signal was made from the sloop. But he paused a second time as he saw how swiftly and threateningly a fierce puff of wind was riding down towards the Medusa on the surface of the waters, fairly lashing them into a wild foam.

"I'm in for it now," he muttered. "And I must be on my guard against that Binnacle," he added, with a somewhat troubled intonation of voice. "The waiters couldn't have injured him a great deal, or he would have been found. Binnacle—Binnacle?" he repeated. "Isn't Binnacle the name of the woman Orliff picked up somewhere at sea or in Melbourne, and was retaining captive on the Island, or in the sloop?"

"It's coming, Mr. Gunnels," cried the man at the wheel. "Every sail set—we shall be taken aback!"

Gunnels started as if shot, at the sudden apparition of Binnacle, from the dark and silent cabin. Jack's head was bound up, and his face bloody, from the beating he had received from the two waiters, but he was not seriously injured. A single glance of his experienced eye seemed to assure him of the peril of the vessel, for he cried sharply to the man at the wheel:

"Hard-a-port, there! hard-a-port, and be lively!"

The man endeavored to obey, but the fierce tempest was too soon upon the ill-fated vessel. He exerted all his strength to avert the danger, but the wheel-rope parted, the wind catching the Medusa on the starboard quarter, and broaching her to.

"Lost, lost!" cried Binnacle. "And those helpless men and women!"

The conclusion of the sentence was lost in the wild fluttering of canvas and crashing of timbers with which the vessel went over on to her beams ends.

"The fiend!" cried Jack.

He had grasped at the weather-mizzen rigging, where he held on with all his might, Gunnels beside him. The drugged sleepers in the cabin were undoubtedly safe for the present—he thought—unless injured by that sudden transit to the lee side of the vessel. The guilty man at the wheel had not been able to assure his safety, but had been hurled over the lee quarter and swept away by the billows. Gunnels's cage had pitched forward into the lee mizen rigging, going the length of the chain by which it was fastened to the deck, and there it hung—Jack momentarily finding himself wondering despite all the peril, whether it would plunge overboard or not.

"Well, here we are," was his first exclamation, with a withering glance at the author of all this ruin, "and a pretty mess you've made us!"

A hand touched him on the arm. By the phosphorescent light of the waves, he could see that it belonged to the steward, who was clinging to the bulwarks beside him.

"That man's done it," the steward shouted, indicating Gunnels. "He's poisoned all the passengers and crew—all except me!"

A strange cry succeeded, coming from the cage hanging there in the lee-main rigging.

"We've stirred up the monkey, anyhow," declared Binnacle, with his usual coolness and good nature, but with a stealthy eye upon Gunnels. "Jocko doubtless thinks he's living in troublesome times!"

The steward had become even paler than the white glare of the waves.

"What a fright it gave me!" he exclaimed. "On my soul, I thought that cry was human!"

Binnacle's experienced eye had already taken in the vessel's position.

"I'll get an axe or two, Norcross," he said, by way of reply, "and we'll cut away the masts!"

This was done, after ten minutes of peril and labor, Gunnels assisting, and then the Medusa righted, cleared to the deck of all her spars and rigging, as of everything moveable she carried, even to her boats.

"So—so!" said Jack; "that looks a little better."

Gunnels had also discovered a cause of joy—the safety of the cage.

"Yes," he muttered, rubbing his hands gleefully together, "it is safe again—quite safe! I wou dn't have Dowlingshire fall to find it for the world!"

"Blast the monkey!" exclaimed the indignant Binnacle. "He takes more care of it than he would of a man or woman. I've half a mind to set the reptile flying, if only to spite the bloody villian!"

As if to appease the sailor's wrath, a sudden lurch caused the chain to draw out the head of the box, and it went flying across the deck, when it was seen to be empty, the prisoner, whoever he was, had previously gone.

By this time, the wind blew a hurricane, the storm culminating, and the vessel rolled heavily, lying in the trough of the waves. The darkness, too, had become intense, so thick and heavy, that Binnacle become apprehensive that the assassin's knife might again be aimed at his life, as he turned to retreat aft.

A lurid flame shot up suddenly at that instant in the cabin, illuminating all the after part of the Medusa.

"Thunder!" cried Binnacle, recoiling. "What's that, Norcross?"

The steward replied only with a wild cry of terror.

"That," said Gunnels, as a blood-red glow from the flame lighted up his swarthy features, till he looked like a fiend. "A stove has been overturned in the cabin, and the ship's on fire!"

"Fire! fire!" cried the steward, in the wildest alarm. "The ship is on fire!"
