MESSAGE FROM THE SEA.

By Charles Dickens.

"On my entering the house I did not at first see you, but on looking in the direction toward which your dog had hastened as soon as the door was opened, I saw a dark wooden staircase, which led out of one corner of the apartment. I was standing in. I saw also, that you, my friend, were being dragged up the stairs in the arms of a very ill-looking man, assisted by (if possible), a still more ill-looking little girl, who had charge of your legs. At sight of me, the man deposited you upon the stairs, and advanced to meet me.

"'What are you doing with that gentleman?' asked.

"'He is unwell,' replied the ill-looking man, 'and I am helping him up stairs to bed.'

"'That gentleman is a friend of mine. What is the meaning of his being in this state?'

"'How should I know?' was the answer; 'I am not the guardian of the gentleman's head.'

"'Well, then, I am,' said I, approaching the place where you were lying; 'and I prescribe to begin with, that he shall leave this place at once.'

"I must own," continued Dufay, 'that you were looking horribly ill, and as I bent over you and felt your barely fluttering pulse, I felt for a moment doubtful whether it was safe to move you. However, I determined to risk it.

"'Will you help me,' I said, 'to move the gentleman to his carriage?'

"'No,' replied the ruffian, 'he is not fit to travel. Besides, what right have you over him?'

"'The right of being his friend.'

"'How do I know that?'

"'Because I tell you so. See, his dog knows me.'

"'And suppose I decline to accept that as evidence, and refuse to let this gentleman leave my house, in his present state of health?'

"'You dare not do it.'

"'Why?'

"'Because,' I answered slowly, 'I should go to the Gendarmerie in the village, and mention under what suspicious circumstances I found my friend here, and because your house has not the best of characters.'

"The man was silent for a moment as if a little baffled. He seemed, however, determined to try once more.

"'And suppose I close my doors and decline to let either of you go; what is to prevent me?'

"'In the first place,' I answered, 'I will effectually prevent your doing any thing of the kind. If you have assistance near, I may be poisoned to-night at French's, and it is not at rare there, I shall soon be in a fever. It was known that I left Doulaise this morning, and most people are aware that there is an inheritance on the road which does not bear the best of reputations, and that its name is La Tete Noire. Now, will you help me?'

"'No,' replied the savage, 'I will have nothing to do with the affair.'

"It was not an easy task to drag you without assistance, from the place where you were lying, out into the open air, down the steps, and to put you into my conveyance, which was standing outside, but I managed to do it. The next thing I had to accomplish was the feat of driving two carriages and two horses single-handed. I could see only one way of managing this. I led my own horse round to the gate of the stable yard, where I could keep my eye upon him, while I went in search of your horses and carriage, which I had to get right without assistance. It was done at last. I fastened your horse's head by a halter to the back of my carriage, and then leading my own beast by the bridle, I managed to start the procession. And so (though only at a foot pace) we turned our backs upon the Tete Noire. And now you know everything.

"'I feel, Castaine,' as if I should never be able to think of this adventure, or to speak of it again. It weirs, somehow or other, such a ghastly aspect, that I sicken at the mere memory of it.'

"'Not a bit of it,' said Dufay, cheerily; 'you will live to tell it as a stirring tale some winter night, take my word for it.'

"Gentleman, the prediction is verified. May the testotum fall next time with more judgment.

"'Wa'al, now,' said Captain Jordan, rising, with his hand upon the sleeve of his fellow-traveller to keep him down, 'I congratulate you, sir upon that adventur, unpleasant at the time, but pleasant to look back upon, as many adventurs in many lives are. Mr. Trudgear, you had a feeling for your money, and it went hard on being S'olen Money. It was not a sum of five hundred pounds, perhaps?'

"I wish it had been half as much," was the reply.

"Thank you, sir. Might I ask the question of you that has been already put. About the place of Lurcan, did you ever hear of any circumstances whatever that might seem to have a bearing—any how—on that question?"

"Never."

"Thank you again for a straight forrard answer," said the captain, apologetically. "You see, we have referred to Lurcan so much in our inquiries, and happening in among the fellows at present, we use the opportunity. In my country we always do use opportunities.

"And you turn them to good account, I believe, and prosper."

"It's a fact, sir," said the captain, "that we get along. Yes, we get along, sir. But I tip the testotum."

It was twirled again, and fell to David Copperfield, an iron-grey man, "sir," said the fellow, the captain whispered to young Copperfield, "as hard as nails. And I wonder what I did it, captain, planning about, 'whether Dad, or Penrewen is here, and which is he?'

David Polreath looked down the long iron grey hair that fell massively upon the shoulders of his large but loose coat, and spoke to them thus:

The question was, Did he throw himself over the cliff of set purpose, or did he fall in walking in the dark and fall over accidentally, or was he pushed over by some person in whom he confided known?

His body was found nearly fifty yards below the fall, caught in the low branches of the trees that overhung the water at the foot of the rocks down the cliff. It was shocking to contemplate, disfigured, so much so as to be hardly recognizable; but for his clothing, and the mark on his linen, I doubt whether any body could have identified him except myself. There was, however, no suspicion of foul play, the circumstances of the usage might all have resulted from his fall, having been driven against the rocks in the fall that encumber the bed of the river in many places below the fall.

When I took of the fall I took for the Mansion, by Arbroath's, and I drove to the house for information of his nearest relations.

He had lived among us very quietly, in the village, and used to go up hill to pass the place of church, which he rarely attended. I was living who was near the place, and I knew I will even confess that I was disappointed—as I expected to see a broken heart to go near the place. I followed him back of the church where he was buried, and grave is; and there he could, without being on the low wall for an hour or more. Sometimes he turned to look across the valley—now a time, and as I had seen him there before, with Homer beside him, watching, while he sketched the beautiful landscape—and sometimes he had his back to it, and his head down as if he were watching her grave. Not that there is anything possible to see of ring-fence there, as in the grave-yard of Christian people who have died in the Church, and when they were not on the church it was an dark, and service, and, of course, no one to be put up over it. Somewhere in the of having the moon level, and I wish he would, if it was, and I go up to Sunday's service, the grave lying in the full moon, remember the poetry that has ever could read about the moon, her heart was religiously broken in my own mind, I said, said we, and Bill [illegible]

The verdict was [illegible] and he had a regular funeral, [illegible] clerk, and [illegible] complete [illegible] only a stone's throw from Hogg's Two of grandeur never [illegible] settle force what [illegible] day, and what mighty [illegible] did at home and [illegible] now in the [illegible] the Jubilee period [illegible] can read it for themselves [illegible] up to look at it. He gravely [illegible] Asheafall itself, and I have known [illegible] away with tears in their eyes after reading the flourishing inscription [illegible] gospel, and saying how [illegible] guished a man should have [illegible] in the prime of life [illegible] believe it. He was never any more than plain James Lawrence to me—a young fellow who, as a lad, had paddled barelegged over the stones of the river, as a guide across fords for visitors; who had been taken a fancy to by one of them, and decently educated; who had made the most of his luck, and done a clever thing or two in engineering; who had come back among us in all his glory, to dazzle most people's eyes, and break little Honor Livingston's heart. The one good thing I know of him was, that he pensioned his poor old mother; but he did not often come near her, and never after Honor Livingston was dead—no, not even in her last illness. It was a marvel to everybody what brought him over here, when we saw him the day before he was found dead; but it was his fate, and he couldn't keep away. That is my view of it. About his death, and the manner of it, all Lurcan had its speculation, and said its say; but I held my peace. I had my opinion, however, and I keep it. I have never seen reason to change it; but on the contrary, I can show you evidence to establish it. I do not believe he either threw himself over the cliff, or fell over, or was pushed over, no I believe he was drawn over—drawn over by something below. When you hear of the noise he made in a little [illegible] was found among his things after he was dead, you will know what I mean. He came [illegible] back to me, knowing I am curious after old stories of the neighborhood; and what I am going to read, is written in his hand. I know his hand well, and I certify to it.—

THE CHEAPEST HAIR DYE IN USE!

PRICE 25 CENTS PER BOX.

BETTER THAN THEY SEEM.

Since PRINSY & CO. reduced the price of their HAIR DYE to

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS,

persons are now using it. We could tell of a lady $50 or over in income. They also find that it acts like magic, changing Green or Red hair instantaneously to a beautiful and at the same time gives it a rich glossy tint as Nature itself. This dye is so scientifically prepared that it will not injure the hair, nor stain the skin when properly applied.

BLACK OR BROWN,
