Meeting of the Traitor Congress.

JEFF. DAVIS' MESSAGE.

Montgomery, April 29.—Congress met at noon.

President DAVIS' message announced the adoption of the permanent constitution of the Confederate States, and that it only remains for an election to be held for the designation of officers to administer the Government.

It says the declaration of war made against the confederation by ABRAHAM LINCOLN rendered it necessary to convene Congress to devise means to replenish the treasury and for the defence of the country.

The President then reviews the relations heretofore existing between the states, and the events which have resulted in the present war. Referring to the results of the mission of the Commissioners to Washington, he says the crooked paths of diplomacy can scarcely furnish an example more wanting in candor, candor, and sincerity as was the course of the United States Government towards our Commissioners. The President then briefly recites the present condition as shown by the fleet off Charleston, the fleet off the mouth of Fort Sumter, and proceeds thus:—

Such was the condition of affairs when, on the 15th ult, I received from the President of the United States a notification that an armed force was to be sent to reinforce Fort Sumter, and that if no hostile resistance was made to the entrance of the fleet and troops into the harbor, no attempt would be made to reinforce the fort or to land the men without previous notice given to me. In the interval between the receipt of this communication and the 6th of April, the Government of the United States, disregarding the 1st article of the treaty of 1778, between the United States and France, which guarantees to the citizens of the Confederate States the protection of their property in the ports of the United States in the event of war between the Confederate States and a third power, seized and confiscated 2 valuable cargoes of arms, consigned to citizens of Charleston, which were in the port of New York when the war broke out between the two countries. Under the 1st article of the treaty referred to, these arms should have been delivered to the consignees or their agents, or else they should have been allowed to pass out of port to be disposed of by their owners. Instead of this, they were seized by the officers of the United States Government, and are now held by them as lawful prize. Other cargoes of arms, shipped before the commencement of the war, but after the secession of several states, were also seized by the officers of the United States Government, and are now held by them as lawful prize. These facts are but a few of many which might be adduced to show the hostile temper and spirit which the United States Government has evinced toward the Confederate States, even before the war between the two countries had been formally declared to exist by the President of the United States. Such being the state of affairs between the two countries, I felt that I could not do less than comply with the request of the President of the United States, and I accordingly ordered the troops under my command to fire upon the fleet of the United States should it attempt to land men or munitions of war in the harbor of Charleston. The fleet did attempt to land men and munitions of war in the harbor, and was fired upon by our troops, and the fleet was compelled to return to the open sea. The President of the United States then informed me that a fleet was also to be sent to reinforce the garrison of Fort Pickens
