"STIRRING UP A NEST OF VERMIN"

"SOLD PAPERS.—Our readers will remember by our advertising columns, that Messrs. Stockwell & Emerson are among the most extensive clothing merchants in the city. They have spared neither time nor expense to make their business what it is, and so thoroughly have they succeeded, that the Tailors have set up a nest of vermin who are so blind to their own interests, as to attempt to injure the business of these men, by circulating false reports among their customers, and by warning them against dealing with Stockwell & Emerson. To effectually do this, these men have located themselves in the same street. To this there could be no objection, if they pursued a legitimate method of transacting their business, but such is not the case. It is not pleasant one to advertise for customers, and having no fair or honest to defend, business plans of the kind, they set to work to prejudice the minds of the public against their neighbors, by representing to them that the goods they offer for sale are not what they represent them to be, and that they are not the same goods they sell themselves. To accomplish this, these men accost the tailors or clothiers in Chatham st, and before or after these gentlemen's customers, and when they are on the way to their store, they warn him, and by some false and plausible story, promising to give a higher price than Stockwell & Emerson, they induce the individual to sell to them. We would warn people not to be deceived by these contemptible tricks, but to carry their goods directly to Stockwell & Emerson, who will pay them the highest market price, and not cheat them in weight as do those hawkers who thus seek to trade on other men's capital."
