JESSE GRANT'S $500.

Another View of the Great Stoms Question.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

Next to the Grants and the Dents, the Stoms family just now ranks as a success in the accident of fame. Some time ago we had occasion to defend Father Stoms from the insidious insinuation that he had tripped Father Grant down the Capitol steps on inauguration day. The incident from which the insinuation grew was that the father of the Stoms family was an old friend of the father of the Grant family, and that the former saw the latter safely bestowed in the hospitable home of his illustrious son after the melancholy accident. The intimacy between the two old gentlemen at that time was one of the happiest imaginable. Father Grant went as far as to say, when on his back in his son's house, to Father Stoms, that he hoped to see him and have a long talk with him, in which they would fix up the offices in the great States of Ohio and Kentucky.

Now Stoms Senior was modest. His ambition had not the exultant and magnificent sweep that characterized the faculties of Grant Senior. Stoms Senior would be content with one sweet boon; the continuance of Captain Horace G. Stoms in office as Assessor of the First Internal Revenue District of Ohio was all he wanted. Strange as it may seem, there were people about Cincinnati who did not believe that Captain Horace G. Stoms was entitled to the place.

When that gifted Tennesseean and favorite son of a sovereign State, Andrew Johnson, was cultivating an unpleasantness with the Senate, the great trouble that office-seekers had was to make the two ends of Pennsylvania avenue meet—that is, to combine the essentials of nomination and confirmation. Captain Stoms was so fortunate as not only to have an old abolitionist without fear or reproach for his father, but to have a family connection and intimate personal association with Mr. Bloss, one of the editors of the Enquirer. With such a friend to start him, and such a father to get him through, he could not help getting office under Andrew Johnson. His continuance in office under Grant's Administration was not one of like complexion, and he would undoubtedly have been turned out among the first, if it had not been for the President's father, who stuck to young Stoms on his father's account. The President personally interfered and kept young Stoms in office, simply because Father Grant, as a favor to Father Stoms, asked for his continuance.

It will not be intropper to note while the hullabaloo is going on about the dropping of young Stoms out of office because he would not appoint Father Grant's five-hundred-dollar rascal as an assistant, that he owes the two years' office that he has enjoyed under the Grant Administration to the personal favor of Father Grant himself.

Whether the enmity of the venerable Postmaster of Covington toward the youthful Assessor of the First Ohio District dates from the five-hundred-dollar negotiation, or is chargeable to other causes, we have no means of knowing.

The was no possibility of keeping young Stoms in office here after the consolidation of the districts, unless as a matter of personal favor. There was nothing in his record as an officer to call for his continuance in the revenue service. If the President had nominated him Assessor of the consolidated district, the nomination would have been received with amazement equal to that with which any of his most unaccountable appointments have been greeted.

If young Stoms had received the appointment, and the five-hundred-dollar negotiation, and the Stoms letter about it to the President had ever seen the light, the transaction could have been interpreted in no other way than that the President had made the appointment to save the father from exposure.

It is the fashion to talk about families in connection with public affairs, but the nepotism of the President makes it necessary; and he will more and more, during the down-hill years of his Administration upon which he has now entered, find that his family, as it has been thrust into place, its members preferred because they were of it, is to the country untolerable, and is like a millstone about his neck. The real difficulty is not that the younger Stoms is left out in the cold upon the termination of his office, but that he was through personal favoritism retained for two years, and that like incidents proved the President's father to be a power in the Administration. This was so absurd and paltry—showed so melancholy a lack of dignity—that no one need be surprised that disgrace has come of it.

A High Time over the High Commission.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—The diplomatic body visited the Capitol yesterday, led by Gen. Schenck, and escorted by two or three people always found on such occasions to follow around after distinguished individuals. Their visit to the Senate was the occasion of a very sharp sensation. This old Forbunk has been distinguished for its dignity. Its dignity is so intense that it is at times disagreeable. When it comes in contact with the House of Representatives its dignity manifests itself in contempt, and to any one having business with a Senator, unless he has high official position, the conduct of the lawmakers is offensive. On this occasion, however, when the High Commission entered the chamber, there was an undignified rush as it from all parts, and an impromptu levee held immediately. Gen. Schenck introduced the Senatorial people rapidly as he could, but the rush was something frantic.

It seemed as if each one felt it to be his last chance to grasp an Earl by the hand. In a few minutes the noise and confusion became so great upon the floor that it was impossible to proceed with any business, and the President vainly endeavored to call the floor devils back to their duties. Gen. Schenck saw that the Senate was making a very unhappy exhibit of itself, and so hauled off as soon as possible, his distinguished crowd. Soon as they were gone, the Senators returned to their seats with a complacent, satisfied air really ludicrous.

From the Senate Chamber these people were conducted to the House of Representatives. After sitting a while in the diplomatic gallery, they were introduced upon the floor. I suppose that these specimens of English nobility would have been mobbed in the House but for the fact that the confusion reigning there at all times was so great that two-thirds of the members did not know they were present. As it was, those in the immediate neighborhood who heard the report or got sight of the company, dropped their pens or newspapers, or hastily deposited the plug they were chewing in the nearest spittoon, and made a run at the Commission. In a few minutes it was surrounded by a dense mob about ten deep, in the midst of which could be heard the sharp voice of Gen. Schenck introducing the Hon. Snooks, the Hon. Stooks, the Hon. Rooks, and so on to the end of the chapter.

Senator Morton's Ambition.

From the World.

Senator Morton of Indiana has had his eye upon Secretary Boutwell's place for a long time, and he will get it if he can. He aims for the Cabinet, and the Treasury is his specialty if possible. He will take the State Department rather than not have a voice in the Cabinet. He is the wiriest wire-puller in either House of Congress. He is a man who incapable of locomotion he is remarkably industrious and active. He came to New York when Murphy was first a candidate for Collector of this port, and had several interviews with him, and afterwards gave him his earnest support in the Senate. Stocking, the ex-alter, Col. Leet's partner in the "general order" business, is the confidential friend of Morton. This relationship comes about through no merit of Stocking, but through an "Indiana Ring" in New York and Washington, organized to further Morton's chances for the successorship of Grant. The idea is to make a Morton party in New York, and Stocking and others are expected to do the work. The latter has ingeniously won the confidence of Leet, who is an Hibernian, and will go for Morton if Grant cannot win. In brief, Senator Morton did not accept the mission to England because he prefers to remain in the country to engineer his own advancement. He has made up his mind that he can beat Grant easiest by being in the Cabinet, and do better by his friends, especially Leet and Stocking and the "Indiana Ring" in New York. If he can control the spoils of the Treasury Department in Washington and run the Custom Houses in New York and elsewhere.

Jesse on Dent.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

"So you're goin' to Washington, are you?" said the venerable father of the Administration to a late fare ticket on its way to the Carnival.

"Yes, I believe I am," was the response.

"Well, I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll give you a letter to Dent, and he will do it right now." And so the venerable patriarch penned the epistle, and continued, "Now you'll go to the White House; walk right in; you'll see a lot of fellers in sort of uniform, but don't be scart; just say you want to see the President, and walk up stairs. If you meet a Dent, and you'll be certain to do that, don't tell 'em you've got a letter. They're the lyingest creatures in the world, and they'll want that letter, an' if they get it you'd never see Lys, and Lys 'll never see that letter. You just say you want only to shake hands with that great man Gen. Grant, and march in."

The instructions were followed, and Lys, the great man, duly shaken.

The Complaint of a Father.

To the Editor of The Sun.

SIR: In Saturday's paper appeared a letter headed "Complaint of a Father," to which it was stated that boys are permitted to play ball in a house in Tenth avenue, between Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth streets, kept by a man named Charlie, and asking if there was no law to prevent this. Now, sir, this man's story is untrue. Every schoolboy knows that there is plenty of law to stop it if complaint is made at the right place, the officers in charge of that district are gentlemen who take pleasure in attending to their duty, and if a letter had made his complaint to them, it would have received immediate attention. But the trouble is that the story is not true.
