BALTIMORE'S HISTORIANS.

THE PRESS OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE CONVENTION.

Pen Pictures of the Distinguished Journalists who Witnessed the Nomination of Horace Greeley by the Democracy of the American Nation.

Correspondence of the Cincinnati Commercial.

BALTIMORE, July 13.—If anything had been needed to satisfy the curious looker-on at Baltimore that the result of the Convention was a thing assured, it was furnished in the countenances of the journalists who had taken such an active part in the deliberations of the Cincinnati Convention. Prominent among those seated upon the stage was Henry Watterson of the Louisville Courier-Journal. There was a great deal of curiosity to see him.

"It would give me much pleasure to meet with him," said a lady to me in the unmistakable Southern accent. The blue blood in her veins was as pure and translucent as ether, and she went on to observe, in that cooing tone peculiar to high breeding this side the line, that some years ago she met in Washington a charming young lady by that name, of wealth and culture, and she surmised it might have been a sister.

"Where was she from," I asked.

"Maryland or Virginia, I forget which," was the reply.

"Then it could hardly have been Mr. Watterson's sister," I ventured. I rather think he hailed from New England, and am under the impression that he is a self-made man. If that is the case, he does not probably belong to a family of wealth and high degree. All I know about him is that he is possessed of great talent, which through indomitable energy and well directed purpose is put to the most available use. He has made the Courier-Journal not only a fine literary paper, but one of the best business mediums in the West."

The closing remark was somewhat lost on my hearer, who had been educated to believe in families. Here, by the way, at every turn it is "a Randolph," "a Jenkens," "a Bayard," or a Fairfax," instead of the saying, as with us: "That is Morton," or "Hendricks," or "Groesbeck." I must make an exception in favor of the great railroad general, Mr. Garrett, who is permitted to stand on his own merits.

The interest of my friend was not quite exhausted, for she levelled her glass upon the devoted head of Mr. Watterson, and asked: "How does he appear in conversation?"

"Very agreeable, indeed," I replied. "You will observe his eyes are weak, and the muscles are not entirely under his control, and his features are irregular, complexion inclinate, and figure inclined to be lumpy. Now, when he talks there is a charming glow of feeling in his face, his mouth is sweet and reliable, and his voice is very kid. He has the whitest and softest hands in the world, and he has a way in conversation of continually folding them, one within the other, as if it was pleasant for them to be together. He has, above all, a hearty earnestness of manner, which conveys the pleasing idea that he means all the flattering things he says to one."

"He must be very attractive."

"Very. Among his accomplishments he can compound the most delicious mint juleps. Some ladies who came East with him said an Indiana friend was quite profuse in his offers to show them places of historic interest on the route, but in the very outset he succumbed to Mr. Watterson's wiles, and was no more seen. He tried to explain that he was not so much taken with the great editor as he was curious and determined to learn the secret of the grass compound."

THEODORE TILTON.

There is a good deal in the way a man eats. It happened that I sat vis-a-vis with Mr. Tilton at Barnum's nearly every meal. I never saw a man more helpless in the hands of the waiters. He gave his order in an uncertain tone, which did not inspire confidence in the obsequient's mind, and eat what was set before him without a murmur. The only sign he gave of interest was an occasional throwing back of the head and uplifting of the eyelids, which revealed as much white above the iris as below, and which, after all, might have been only an evolution of his inner consciousness.

It was such a contrast to the manner in which Mr. Bowles made much of himself at the table. He acted as if he was the keeper of the splendid physique the good God had given him, and treated it to choice wines and the daintiest food. His wise, genial face was missed from this Convention.

The close view I had of Mr. Tilton was not needed to reveal the childish faith and feeling heart which made him an easy prey to the feminine Demosthenes. After seeing him I can forgive the biography.

In person Mr. Tilton is about five feet ten in height, with a sparse allowance of adipose, owing to the self-regret referred to. He is not lean as well formed as he should be, and has the most veritable slouch in his gait. Imagine this bowed and sparse but not acile form arrayed in gray pantaloons and a blue-striped coat, and you have the pedestal of a head which is so burdened with long yellow hair that its outlines can not be easily determined. It is the color Titian in shade, but has not that lightness nor delicacy of texture. Mr. Tilton's features or not regular, but there are all sorts of odd developments, betokening order, taste, fancy, and reverence, and when he smiles his countenance is very attractive. The cold blue eyes lighten some, soft and kind, and even the sallow complexion loses its sickly hue.

WHITELAW REID.

The appearance of this gentleman is familiar to your Cincinnati readers, but there are thousands in Indiana and elsewhere to whom a description would be interesting. By some unaccountable reason he is conceded to be the Bayard of the press, and the fastidious accounts of his toilets made me wholly unprepared for the spirit of solitude (vide Shelley) habited in the meanest black mustard-looking clothes imaginable. His hair is not intellectually thin, but is as black as night, and hangs in dark masses about his pallid face. The flesh is cold and clammy to the touch as surely as the world. Great luminous black eyes dart an uncertain light from under cavernous brows, and a shapely nose, mouth, and chin suggest the perfect oval of the face if rounded out by generous diet and a mind free from the care of ambition. The man is eaten up alive by ambition, and if he does not succeed will afford the country the two days' sensation of a journalistic funeral. In manner, however, he was very much calmer than in Philadelphia or Cincinnati when he sent that semi-religious, praise God-political telegram to New York. If, in fine, any person has the feather weight it is, he will listen to the warning it has freely given.

HORACE WHITE.

This noted journalist is by far the most intellectual looking of the group I have attempted to describe. He is under-sized in both height and flesh, with a face singularly pale almost to a suggestion of ill health. He has regular features, large dark eyes, and rather a cynical expression, surrounded by jet black hair and black whiskers that cover all the lower part of his face. He has the student's stoop in his shoulders, and a quiet, self-possessed way that indicates a man on good terms with himself and not altogether satisfied with the rest of mankind. One after looking at him, understandingly, could know without trouble how it was that a poor clerk on eighteen hundred a year and a family dependent upon him came within eight years not only rich, but a power in the land. Many say that this was the result of accident, but one possessed of any knowledge, looking in Horace White's face would be satisfied that if he did not make his corner on whiskey he would unquestionably have accumulated upon something else. Horace White is not a man that a beggar would select out of a crowd to solicit alms of, and he is said to have done some generous acts in his lifetime. I suspect they were like angels' visits in more respects than one, for his face looks to me like a sign on ice of "Danger Here." Gen. Grant says that Horace, who was an old friend of his, won't do to tie to, and we all know that Horace reciprocates. Horace White and John Russell Young were the only two editors in the United States that Gen. Grant ever honored with consultation and confidence. John Russell Young is too much his friend, while Horace was not enough so. The first tried to borrow his money, and failed, while the last, refusing pecuniary aid, attacked the Administration.

RAMSDELL AND WHITE.

On a line among the solid ranks of reporters who occupied the space given to the press sat the heroes of the treaty. A greater contrast could not be presented. Mr. White is thin and spare, with a steady expression of reserve and timidity, and dresses with the utmost care, his well trained mutton-chop whiskers floating off in regular lines on either side of his marvellous cravat. He is both intelligent and agreeable, but it was a great mistake when he was born in Maryland instead of Philadelphia, and the affairs of men went agley when he took to the pen instead of to law.

Mr. Ramsdell, on the other hand, looks born to his ease; and with well rounded figure coolly adjusted to summer clothes, Jean Crispin face and nonchalant air, seemed to have no part or parcel in the diversion the Convention afforded.

was another journalist whose occupation was gone. He paid earnest attention to all the proceedings, but it was plain he knew them in advance. The fact is, he has attended so many conventions in his eventful youth that he is tired of them, and at every last one feels crushed down and bored by all that have preceded it. Still he never loses sight of his duty, and the secret of his grand success as a journalist lies in the fact that his nose for news is unerring as a sleuth hound's, and he seems to possess the remarkable faculty of being in all places at once, so no sort of game escapes him.

In appearance Mr. McCullagh has changed materially since as "Mack" he won a world-wide reputation as the Commercial correspondent. He is much stouter, which takes from the preponderance of his brain organism. Slight as he is, he must have unusual physical health to be able to accomplish the vast amount of brain work he performs. He is never missed from the busy crowd, is never seen to take a note, and after everybody else has gone to bed, dodges down to the telegraph office and despatches a couple of columns of matter, as crisp and vigorous as if it had been the first fruits of a night's reflection and rest. What speaks yet more for him than his genius is the warm friends he makes the world over.

BEN. PERLEY POORE.

My pen staggers at an attempt to picture this veteran reporter. He has a body and a head like the portrait of Dumas, but there the resemblance ceases. It is the oddest combination of the earth, earthy, and the intellectual that ever was imagined in a face. It is just as if the fat cheeks and round chin, full mouth and chubby nose had been tied down with lines of thought. Then the big prominent eyes are as strong and keen to take an impression as the sun, and he writes continually in a good-sized note-book with untiring force and accuracy, sometimes joining pleasantly in conversation, without losing the thread of proceedings or his particular line of thought.

BROMLEY.

Within a few seats of Mr. Poore sat his antipodes in the person of the representative of the Hartford Post. He, too, was engaged in sending despatches, but did not seem to be making so much of a business of it, and his active brain, no doubt, was also engaged in culling the material for another such brilliant review as he furnished the public with on the occasion of the Philadelphia Convention. The careful reader of that acute, just, and comprehensive review (copied in the Commercial) would have his prepossessions sustained by an acquaintance with the author. He is an eminently handsome man, and is built on a more delicate model than the others I have described. Not above five feet nine in height, he has a compact, graceful figure, and his features and complection are as delicate and fair as a woman's. Soft rings of black hair set off without shading the face, and lips that open square and full as if he had never known sorrow disclose an exquisite set of teeth. A handsome moustache and heavy whiskers complete the picture, which is illuminated by honest and expressive eyes. He was dressed so well that the particular style has slipped my mind, but I remember a brown linen shirt bosom and collar, relieved by a blue neck tie.

THE SUN.

In the Washington correspondent of THE SUN I had a vivid realization of the masterly powers of Mr. Dana. He is quite a young man and good-looking, with an abundance of light brown hair and regular features; there is nothing in his appearance to denote a lively interest in anything which transpires, but the moment he engages in conversation one discovers the animating principle which makes the SUN establishment the most telegraphic of the age. His eyes and ears were wide open, and there was not a possible crumb of Western news that he did not reach out after, even to asking who gave Peter Wilkins the money.

THE PRESS IN GENERAL.

There are but a few of the distinguished members of the press, no doubt, for they were as many, I was about to say, as the sands of the sea. What space there was was packed and jammed with men, at least two-thirds of whom seemed to have no business there. The assembly comprised samples of every variety of journalists in America, the next best friend included, for by some insane arrangement each member was permitted to take a second, whose duty it seemed to take the best seat within reach. There was lots of grumbling by the metropolitan press about the country press and decid beats, but it was rather enjoyable to see the row.

A marked feature of the occasion was the number of Southern representatives of the press, whose appreciation of the occasion was decidedly entertaining. They stood in their seats to catch the sense, and when anything occurred to tickle their fancy indulged in the most uproarious applause.

Another noticeable fact was the number of young men. Nearly every one was very young, and how he caught the spirit of the occasion and transmitted it, fresh and graphic, by telegraph, to his readers made the wonder. Surely, modern education must be a long ways ahead of the old methods of thoughts. It used to take a man half a lifetime to unlearn what was essential to ripe scholarship.

REAL ESTATE MARKET.

Despite the weather a little animation was manifest at the Exchange Salesroom.

E. H. Ludlow & Co. sold, by order of the Supreme Court, a house and lot on Ridge street, near Rivington, for $6,500; one lot on south side of 130th street, west of Eighth avenue, for $5,050. They announced, by order of executors of N. W. Stuyvesant, three acres of land with improvements, also seven village plots at Rye Point, Westchester county, at auction yesterday.

The surprise court sale announced by J. M. Miller is adjourned to July 24.

We note among private transactions the sale of four lots northeast corner of Fifth avenue and 126th street, for $56,000. The same lots were sold by Mr. Miller in June for $52,000, by P. McBride, who paid $32,000 for them about four years ago.

Lefferts & Hubbard attended the summer sale of lots at Bayside yesterday, and a good report may be expected.

A Feud Ending in Bloodshed.

CHICAGO, July 18.—In Illopolis, Ill., a feud has existed for the past two weeks between one Dickerson and a man named Canterell and their respective friends. On Saturday night last a pitched battle took place, in which Dickerson and his party were roughly used. Mr. J. M. Burch dressed the wounds of the vanquished, and subsequently was assaulted therefor by Canterell and his party. Early the next evening Burch went with a posse to arrest his assailants and a fight ensued. Burch fired into the crowd, wounding one Kendall, an adherent of Canterell, so that he died yesterday. Burch was arrested and held to bail.

The West Side's Biggest Nuisance.

To the Editor of The Sun.

SIR: If any of our City Fathers were compelled to ride by the horse boiling establishment near Thirty-fourth street dock twice a day for a few days, when the wind wafted the sickening stench over the river, there would be some chance of the nuisance being abated; but, as it is, people may protest through the papers to their heart's content, and that is all the good it does. Is there a better appeal to THE SUN to use its influence in this matter, and thereby confer an everlasting favor on the travelling public?
