BOSS TWEED IN THE WEST.

Widow Cliquot and Henry Clay Regalios in the Burnet House.

From the Cincinnati Inquirer, Sept. 8.

That gem from New York's costly Ring, Wm. M. Tweed, the "Black Prince" of the newspaper correspondent, was yesterday at the Burnet House. He arrived at one o'clock in the morning from New York by way of Columbus, and departed on the 8:10 evening train for Chicago. He was accompanied by his dear friend, S. F. Dewey. Of course he was interviewed. The reporter was ushered into one of the two grand parlors on the ground floor, which had been chartered for the twenty-four hours' visit, and was seated by a softly spoken cold-red man in a velvet arm-chair, where he waited until Billy, in the next room, gave the finishing touches to his shining black beard. The prince bears his trials nobly; there dwelt on his olive colored plump face a look of serene peace, touched with a shade of sadness, it is true, such as could permeate only a true martyr, and could the ruthless and vengeful New York editor who made such a howl about the little financial inaccuracies but have seen him yesterday afternoon, as he mournfully toyed with the watch chain that rested in yellow magnificence across his paunchy abdomen, and heard with what meek obedience he answered the reporter's questions, that editor must have paused. Indeed, he would have wept had he witnessed the subdued pensiveness of the air with which Mr. Tweed, taking for cigars and wine, of the grand saliness of his manner when he pressed a handful of twenty-five cent cigars into the pocks of the reporter's coat. He talked freely. Yes, he had had lots of trouble, and he was not yet out of it, either. It was true that he had been accused of hiding from the police at his country house, and he would not be at all surprised if unfavorable comment would be made in regard to his westward trip. What did he think of those New York editors anyhow? This question called for no answer. The dilated pupils and the purpling of the little veins about the tip of his nose told the story. How did he like what he had seen of Cincinnati? It was a fine city, but if he were manager of the public works he would have that hill on Vine street below found cut entirely away. Had he been treated with personal discourtesy by any one? No, indeed; wherever he had stopped the best rooms in the house had not been refused him, and the hotel clerks who, he had remarked, treated other people with haughty supercilious-ness were all hurry the minute he wrote his name in the register. Mr. Tweed made a brief and comprehensive review of his career, from the days when he threw off the cabinetmaker's cap in the Houston street shop until the beginning of his temporary retirement, pausing every now and then to relate the reporter's champagne glass. It was a moving spectacle, the sight of the great man when he described his emotions on reading the warrant for his arrest. A less granitic person than the reporter might be excused for slobbering. And where was he going, and what was he going to do, and when was he going back to New York? Ah, he was going to Chicago, and, as he had been told that was a city of fine opportunities, he was going to look around there. And as for returning to his ungrateful home? His face darkened, and he arose and paced over to the window. It was plain that the last question had struck home, and fallen majesty sought to mask its anguish under pretence of looking out of the window. The reporter said never another word, but finding he champagne and lighting the remaining cigar, sauntered across the marble pavement and down the broad steps on his way to the office.

Accident to a Buck Paysier.

From the Akron (Ohio) Beacon.

Judge Ambler was generally respected until he succumbed to the back-pay seduction, so that for the sake of the esteem we have endeavored to trust that the following item of the Youngstown Vindicator is untrue: Jacob Ambler, the back-pay grabber, has undertaken to defend his course by fighting. He kicked Don Hardman of the Salem Clipper for something said about it, whereupon the Doctor relaliated by knocking Jacob over the head with a cane. Hostilities suddenly ended.
