THE LOUNGER AT FRENCH'S

WHAT LOOSE'S FRIEND MADE BY TRYING TO ROPE HIM IN.

The Glittering Allurements which were Presented to the Lounger—The Hundred Dollar Greenbacks that the Lounger went For—The Man who is Waiting for Them.

Yesterday afternoon a SUN reporter was accosted by a stranger in front of French's Hotel. "Why, my dear old fellow, how do you do!" exclaimed the gentleman, the light of joyous recognition breaking over his otherwise inexpressive countenance, as he extended a somewhat soiled hand. "how long have you been in the city?" The reporter seized the proffered hand, and, delighted to see one who was evidently an old friend, although he couldn't exactly recollect where he had first met him, he said he had been in New York a fortnight and more, and, anticipating the next two questions, he added that he intended to remain a week longer, lodging in French's Hotel. "How is Mr. Loose?" was the next inquiry.

Ashamed to acknowledge that he had forgotten all about Mr. Loose, the reporter said he believed that gentleman was as well as could reasonably be expected; but added as a saving clause, that it was a long time since he had seen him.

"I am stopping at Sweeny's," said Mr. Loose's friend, "I find it a very comfortble hotel. I shall be leaving next week. We can go home together. By the way," he continued, suddenly changing the subject, "I am looking for No. 90 Nassau street; do you know where it is?" Fortunately the reporter was able to point out Nassau street, but the exact spot required he could not designate.

A PRIZE.

"I have drawn a prize in a lottery," continued Mr. Loose's friend, "and I am directed to go to have it cashed at No. 90 Nassau street. If you have nothing better to do we might go together and look for the place."

The reporter had nothing better to do, and being devoured with curiosity, he unhesitatingly accompanied his new friend.

They wandered up and down Nassau street for some time in a fruitless search for No. 90, which, in their common ignorance of the city, they must have passed some half dozen times, and found it at last only by the happy accident of Mr. Loose's friend inquiring of a boy who stood at the door with apparently little to do and unlimited time to do it in.

"How very fortunate that we asked him," said the holder of the lottery ticket, delighted; at the same time fixing his eyes with such a singular expression of interest upon the reporter's watch chain, that the latter mechanically buttoned up his coat.

Mr. Loose's friend led the way up the first flight, at the top of which, on the left hand, was

A DOOR MARKED "AGENCY."

Here he paused, and drawing the lottery ticket from his pocket, showed it to the reporter. All the address he received in the latter to get hold of this ticket proved unavailing. Its owner held it with both hands, and could not be induced to let it out of his possession for a moment. There was a faded air of printing on it, but all the reporter could see was the heading, "Kentucky State Lottery."

Putting it back in his pocket, Mr. Loose's friend knocked at the door, and being invited in a business-like tone to "come in," he pushed it open and entered; but not before he had whispered "it may be worth $630," and the reporter had devoutly wished it might. The room was occupied by two men of a widely different stamp from Mr. Loose's friend. Both were fashionably dressed, and though their beauty was somewhat of the forrest order, they had considerable of the look of good books, the one having the more elegant, the other middle-aged, slightly bald, and stout. The latter retreated to a distant part of the room, while the former advanced to meet the newcomers.

"I believe I have drawn a prize," said Mr. Loose's friend in a hesitating tone. "Are you the agent?"

"I am, sir," said the slim gentleman, taking the ticket, and going to a desk on the other corner. After conning the volume for a few moments, and comparing the numbers thereon with those upon the ticket, he said: "A hundred and one dollars, sir."

THE LUCK OF MR. LOOSE'S FRIEND.

The fortunate holder of the lucky ticket nudged the reporter vigorously in the ribs, and exclaimed, "That's not so bad." The reporter was too much impressed to reply. He merely moved out of the range of his friend's elbows.

"Do you give me an order for the money?" asked Mr. Loose's friend.

"No, sir," replied the slim gentleman, "we cash the ticket right here," and suiting the action to the word, he went to a table in the centre of the room, and from a drawer therein produced several hundred dollar greenbacks, one of which he handed to Mr. Loose's friend.

"Should the drawing of this ticket prove to be the lucky one, you know where to find us for your last payment." It was no connection with the general lottery, as you are told before leasing the room whether you have won a prize or not. All alone to show you." As it was he peeled off the outer bill of the said exposed roll, or rather, from which he handed the reporter a fifty dollar greenback, and Mr. Loose's friend the two and twenty dollars. It was seized upon by the stout gentleman, and the reporter inclined to join in the chase. Another turn of the screw resulted in what the slim gentleman called a "star number." An evidence on behalf of the reporter, it was given with such clearness that Mr. Loose's friend understood it at once. Not so with the reporter; he tried so hard to comprehend it that his brain reeled with the effort, but without success; for when the game was renewed the prevailing impression left upon his mind was that the board contained all prizes and no blanks. Nevertheless, it must have been a perfectly fair game, for a few moments afterward Mr. Loose's friend won eighteen dollars more. He was now in high spirits, and invited the reporter to draw up close to the table; the latter did as requested, and in his eagerness to watch the game, pressed so close to the side of Mr. Loose's friend that that gentleman's disengaged hand was forced against his chest in such a manner that, had he not taken the precaution to button his coat before entering, it must unquestionably have become entangled in

HIS WATCH CHAIN.

Still the game rolled on; the tide of fortune was setting strongly in favor of Mr. Loose's friend, and it looked as though he must infallibly break the bank. The reporter was in a fever of excitement, and after having himself thrown the dice and won $5 for his new acquaintance, he decided at all hazards to join in the game, and with this view asked Mr. Loose's friend to accommodate him with the paltry sum of $2. The agent looked at Mr. Loose's friend and Mr. Loose's friend looked at the agent. Then they both looked at the reporter and he looked at the board and said nothing; while the stout gentleman at the other end of the room turned quickly round and looked at all three. Mr. Loose's friend was the first to break the silence. "I'll lend you $2 this time," said he, "but you must take for yourself after that."

The reporter consented. He would have consented to anything, he was in such a hurry to win. Again the dice were rattled, and in a twinkling the reporter found himself the winner $5. He would now have taken the money and gone home, but nobody else in the room wished him to do so—not even Mr. Loose's friend; as for the agent, he marked his disapprobation of any such course by taking up the money and removing it beyond the reporter's reach, and as they were three and he was but one, he smothered a sigh and threw the dice again. He won $12, and his desire to go was stronger than ever. But now he was told that by merely risking $2 more the chances would be ten to one in favor of his winning the enormous sum of $150. Strange to say he hesitated. The agent was astonished; Mr. Loose's friend shook his arm and asked him whether he was mad, adding at the same time, in a whisper, to the pleasure would experience when he returned with a hundred and fifty dollars in his pocket; from the corner in which the stout gentleman sat came a low gurgling sound resembling a smothered laugh. Under so much pressure the reporter yielded; he determined to risk, if necessary, all he possessed on the turn of a die, and in the firm tone of one who had fully resolved upon his course of action he plunged his hand into his pocket, and asked the agent to lend him $2. Very reproachfully the slim gentleman looked at him; even Mr. Loose's friend evidently regarded his moderate demand from a suspicious standpoint; the wrath of the stout gentleman in the corner was too deep for words. He glared vindictively at the reporter for a moment, and then concealed his face and his indignation behind a newspaper. As soon as he had recovered his composure, the slim gentleman explained that it was contrary to the rules of the house to lend money. The reporter then solicited the further favor of a temporary accommodation from Mr. Loose's friend, but here again the rules of the house interfered; neither borrowing nor lending, he agent said, was permitted. The reporter thought it a little strange that it should have been allowed in the first instance, but the circumstance was too trivial to be alluded to. Fertile in resources, the reporter then suggested that he should take the money on the table, go to his hotel, and return in ten minutes with a vast sum wherewith to carry on the game. The agent consented to this with a single amendment regarding the disposal of the money in the pool; that he thought should be left where it was until the reporter returned, when it should be played for; but the room closed at 5 o'clock, and could not, on any consideration, be kept open a minute longer. It was then half past 2, and an agony of fear came over the reporter that he might be too late. He sprang from his seat, and asking Mr. Loose's friend to accompany him, he hurried from the room. Along Nassau street the pair of speculators sped, the reporter in his eager haste keeping his companion at a smart trot.

THEIR DISCOURSE,

as far as the rapid pace at which they were travelling would permit them to hold any discourse at all, was confined to their prospects of speedily acquiring wealth. Mr. Loose's friend hoped they might each realize five hundred dollars before the close of the day, while the reporter, more sanguine, went a step further, and said he was confident that he should win not less but rather more than a thousand dollars before the shades of evening fell.

At Beekman street Mr. Loose's friend paused and reflected. "I may want more money than I have here," he said; "my uncle lives down this way; suppose I go and get some from him, and meet you at this corner?"

The reporter assented.

"Well, then," said his companion, "you run round to French's and get all the money you can, and meet me here in ten minutes."

The reporter promised to be punctual, and started off, resolved to return with all the money he possessed himself, and as much more as his friends could be induced to lend him. But unforeseen circumstances frustrated his designs, and, under the pressure of unexpected business, he forgot Mr. Loose's friend. It was near midnight when he recollected his appointment, and, unhesitatingly throwing everything else aside, he thrust into his pocket such few hundred dollar greenbacks as were lying loose on the floors of the SUN office and ran to Beekman and Nassau streets. It was rather dark, but a short, thick-set figure was observed to jump in the direction of 90 Nassau street, was the disconsolate figure of a man. The reporter recognized him by his coat, which shone more brightly than his boots. It was Mr. Loose's friend going by a circuitous route to Sweeny's Hotel.

A Noble Work.

The Free Dormitory for Women at 20 South Fifth avenue, which was established in July last by a society of young men called "The Fraternals," has been successful. This institution provides a temporary shelter for respectable destitute women, together with a bath and free medical attendance in cases of sudden illness. Every facility is given for obtaining employment. Since the opening of the Dormitory, several hundred women have availed themselves of the privileges offered, most of whom might otherwise have been compelled to walk the streets or sleep in police stations. The Dormitory is the only place in the city where a respectable woman without means can find temporary shelter. The work is done voluntarily, not one dollar subscribed is required to pay for salaries of officers, but every cent goes directly to the object for which it was intended, without any discount whatever. Several noted lecturers have interested themselves in behalf of this excellent institution, and have promised to aid the Fraternals by delivering lectures for the institution. Among them are the Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin, the Hon. S. S. Cox, the Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems, the Hon. A. Oakey Hall, the Rev. Washington Gladden, the Hon. Ingersoll Lockwood, the Rev. Sergt. Minglins, William Anderson, Esq., and the Rev. W. T. Clarke. Tonight, in the chapel of the Church of the Strangers, the Hon. Oakey Hall, the author of the Footlights, will lecture on "The Best Society." The admittance fee is only twenty-five cents.
