LOST IN A HURRICANE.

The Fate of Capt. Levien's Mate—Vessels Crippled in a Terrific Storm.

The German ship Martha, Capt. Levion, reached this port yesterday after a voyage of sixty-four days from Bremen. She was in ballast, and was consigned to Funck, Edye & Co. of 87 South William street. The voyage of the Martha was long and stormy. Capt. Levien reports that on the 7th inst., in latitude 40°, longitude 64°, he encountered a heavy gale from the southeast, which lasted for several hours. After a time the wind veered to the northwest, and for hours the Martha forged ahead in a terrific hurricane. Up to the advent of the nor'wester all had gone well, but when the hurricane struck her most of the canvas set was ripped into ribbons, and every spar of the ship was strained to its utmost. So sudden was the veering of the wind and the rush of the furious squalls that it was impossible to furl many of the sails, although officers and crew worked well and manfully, knowing that their lives depended on their activity. The main and mizzen topsails were torn from the yards as the squall struck the vessel, and carried through the air like kites. The foretopsail stood the blast a little longer, but soon it too gave way and followed the others. The main and foresails were split, the former being rent to shreds and flapping about the yard before the latter gave way. The vess l being in ballast and light for the mountainous sea ploughed up by the angry winds, rolled fearfully, and nothing loosened on deck was out of the question. As Capt. Levien expressed it, "She dipped her topmasts every roll." To add to the terrors of the situation, she sprung her mainto mast when the squall first broke upon her, and the crew beneath were in momentary expectation of the falling of some of her spars.

As the foresail split, officers and crew were well forward, and the Captain ordered the men to go aft and furl the flapping canvas. They stood appalled, and for a moment not a man moved. Seeing that fear had taken possession of the men, Capt. Levien and his chief officer, Theodore Haesert, simultaneously sprang into the rigging, and coaxed the foreyard together. Then the crew followed one by one, even to the cook. Mr. Haesert was at one end of the yard and the Captain at the other, as a heavy lot of sea struck the vessel. All clung to the yard with desperation except Mr. Haesert, who was seized by the blast and thrown far out into the sea.

Soon afterward the gale abated, and Capt. Levien had a new mate. Meanwhile, at the same time repairing as well as possible the damages to spars and rigging. Not a piece of canvas that was set when the hurricane struck the vessel was fit for use, and much of the upper rigging was badly damaged.

Mr. Haesert had been chief officer of the Martha for nearly four years, and would have been her captain next year had he lived. He was a native of Dantzic, and leaves a wife and family. His brother is master of the bark Anna Berta.

The bark Elise Lange and a light boat of which were in about the same latitude as the Martha on the 7th inst., suffered some damage, but lost no men.

The Norwegian bark Siljo, which arrived here yesterday from Rotterdam, had in any of her sails split and her bulwarks stove in. Her mate, she passed a heavy nor'wester, brig Walsh had lost her mainmast and forefoot gallantmast. She had doubtless sustained the loss in the hurricane of the 7th inst.
