EXCITEMENT IN TOTTENVILLE.

The Verdict that was Announced on Saturday Evening in the Pleasant Little Hamlet at the Mouth of Staten Island Sound.

Tottenville, the whitewashed hamlet just clinging on the southwestern edge of Staten Island, not many stone throws from the New Jersey shore, has been hugging a sensation to its little bosom ever since the middle of November. It culminated on Saturday afternoon, in a trial in which the plaintiff complained that on the 16th of November last Walter T. Elliott wilfully and unlawfully broke down and entered the close of William W. Garrettson, and maliciously cut down a tree of great value to said Garrettson's possession; wherefore the plaintiff demanded $200.

The little court room of Justice Wood was entirely inadequate for the accommodation of all the inhabitants of Tottenville, who were bound to see the case, and he the...fore adjourned to the large barroom of Walker's Hotel, scarcely ten seconds' walk from the depot. It is a noble room for a place like Tottenville, yet every square foot of it held a spectator.

The Justice sat at his desk just next the billiard table, with the plaintiff and his lawyer on the right hand, and the defendant with his lawyer on the left. He is a portly, well-kept man, mature in years, with a glossy bald head, fringed with the gravest of hair. Gold-bowed spectacles gave his Pickwickian face a dignity becoming to his office and duties, and on his breast sparkled a pin of unique design, consisting of three distinct brooches, tied together by a delicate gold chain. All around stood the witnesses and spectators.

After the jury had been sworn the plaintiff made his oath that a tree on the extreme edge of his land had been cut down by the defendant in the course of a survey; that said tree was of all trees in the world the one most essential to his happiness, and that $200 would be only a partial reparation for the blight cast upon his life.

"What, Mr. Garrettson," asked his lawyer, "is the market value of the lots into which your land is divided, and of the one of which this tree was such a marked ornament?"

"They have no market value."

"No market value at present," emphasized the lawyer, "is what you mean. I cannot allow you, sir, to place your land on records alongside the world as saying that lots in Tottenville have no value. As a citizen of the village I cannot permit it." [Tumultuous applause from around the billiard table.]

"Now, sir," continued the lawyer, "what was the value of that tree to a rich man coming from the city to a place like this with its social advantages and its commercial future, as a shade tree near his suburban dwelling?"

Witness thought about $75.

Landscape gardeners also valued the tree at $75. Then the defendant swore that the tree, though standing on Garrettson's side of the fence, was really one-half on the land of the man whose farm he was surveying, and that he had to cut it in order to make the survey. Several witnesses swore that the tree was worth about $4, and then the lawyers took hold of it for their final speeches. One spoke vehemently and voluminously on the basis of "an Englishman's house being his castle," and the other took up the strain and proved that the American nation could not afford to stand by and see the path of civilization blocked by trees, and the future of Tottenville blotted by such insults as this. Then the Justice poured an holy charge on the troubled water, and the jury, after short deliberation, dismissed the suit.

TO ONE-HALF THE USUAL RATES!

THE ADMISSION
Owing to the immense capacity of the building—accommodating ten thousand—Mr. Barnum is enabled to gratify his desire of giving all an opportunity to visit the Great Roman Hippodrome, and has accordingly reduced the admission to one-half the usual rates.

THE ATTRACTIONS.
The attractions which have proved so popular will not only be retained, but continually increased by the constant addition of new race horses, new native and foreign equestrians, and new features in every department.

THE HIPPODROME.
The building is a marvel of luxurious comfort, with ventilation so perfect as to call forth favorable comments from all interested in sanitary measures. For pure air, delightful temperature, and freedom from dangerous draughts, the Hippodrome surpasses all other amusement buildings in the world.

AMUSING PANTOMIME,
JACK THE GIANT KILLER!
