WAS THIS WIFE MURDER?

A VERY MYSTERIOUS TRAGEDY IN A RURAL NEIGHBORHOOD.

A Woman Found Dead in her Bed, Having been Strangled—The Husband's Story—The Wife's Life said to have been Insured.

From the Oil City Derrick.

ELLINGTON CENTRE, N. Y., July 25.—Yesterday Mrs. Emily Crosby, wife of James Crosby, was found in her bed strangled to death.

This quiet village is nestled among the Chautauqua hills, four miles northeast of the Kennedy station, and about fourteen miles from Jamestown. The inhabitants were seen in little knots upon the streets, busily discussing the tragedy. A road led up a hill behind the town. Following this about two miles, a neat-looking white farm cottage appeared by the side of the road. Opposite it were two other houses, neither having fences about the yards. Mr. Wheeler, a brother-in-law of Mr. Crosby, led the reporter to a house near by and introduced him to Mr. Crosby, the husband of the murdered woman. He is of medium size, spare form, with dark hair and beard, sunken cheeks, and dark, sunken eyes. His appearance is rather prepossessing, and his address pleasant. On being questioned by the reporter he told his story as follows:

"I went down town at night and returned at 10 o'clock. I rode down and walked back. As I reached the road in front of my house I heard a whistle. I thought it was my brother-in-law and said 'Chauncey,' but heard no answer. I then went around to the back door, which was unlocked, as it usually is. As I went by the house I noticed that the light which usually burned in our bedroom was out, and the window was dark. I went into the house by the back door, and looked it as I did so. I then walked into the dining room toward our bedroom door, and called to my wife, but heard nothing. I then asked where the light was, and stepped toward the door. I heard a slight rustle on the carpet, and then felt this blow on my head."

He here showed a wound about an inch long, breaking the skin over the right temple, and looking as if made by some blunt instrument wielded by a person standing in front of him.

Mr. Crosby continued: "The blow did not knock me down, but I was stunned for a second. I knew there was some person there, and grappled with him. He was a strong man, and the struggle was a hard one for a second or more, when the front door flew open suddenly. The fellow made a rush for the door, carrying me still clinging to him. We scuffled in this way across the yard to the road, when I saw him make a movement upward with one of his hands. I seemed to feel that he was going to shoot, and threw my left hand up. I heard the report and felt the pain in this finger."

His little finger on the left hand was bandaged up, and the doctor said it had been shot through by a bullet.

Continuing his story, Mr. Crosby said: "All this time I was crying 'Murder.' We wrestled until we got across the road into my brother's yard, when I received another blow, whether by the man I had hold of or not I do not know. This blow stunned me."

A large wound showed where the last blow had been struck.

"I then fell to the ground," he continued. "My brother-in-law had heard my cries of murder, and reached the spot very soon. I was then lying face downward, bleeding badly. Several other of my relatives now came to the place. One of them says that the first words I said were, 'Go for Bentley.' Bentley is the man who paid me some money on the day of the night this occurred. I do not remember saying this. As soon as I regained consciousness I asked for my wife. My sister-in-law ran into the house and soon returned and said she feared my wife was dead."

At this point Crosby broke down and cried, great gulps forcing themselves up his throat. After a few moments he said:

"My sister-in-law then went back to the house, and returning, said she guessed my wife had only fainted, and I did not know different until yesterday forenoon. I kept asking for her, but they said she was too weak to see me."

While speaking of his wife Mr. Crosby was greatly affected, and several times shed tears. Conversing with the brother-in-law, Mr. Crosby's statements were confirmed so far as his crying "Murder!" his being found with wounded head and hand, and the general details of the fracas; also as to time. No one, however, saw any other person or persons, nor could any tracks be found which would lead one to connect them with the tragedy.

Inside the house in the body of the murdered woman, neatly laid out for burial. Upon her neck were the marks of the fingers and thumb which had choked her life out, sunk deep in the flesh and discolored, and on one shoulder was a slight discoloration, as if the person while holding his hand upon her throat had stubbed her there with the other hand. The face was that of a fair looking woman, of the usual type of country women.

The bed, where the woman was murdered, stood near the door; at the foot was a small trundle bed in which slept Mr. Crosby's ten-year-old boy, a son of his first wife. This child was not awakened by the noise. Near the boy's bed was a chest, the contents of which had been tossed about. Against the side of the room hung Mr. Crosby's coat, from the pockets of which the $27 was taken. On a stand was the revolver belonging to Mr. Crosby, and which the persons who attacked him used. This revolver was found on the following morning in the yard. On the carpet a little distance from the bedroom door, was a pool of blood, not spread out, but as if a person had stood there and bled. Crosby says he was wrestling while in the room, yet the blood looks as if the person was standing still. On the inside of the door is also seen the imprints of a bloody hand. If the door was thrown open as Crosby says before he got there, how did the blood get on the inside of it? An old woman slept in a room near by in the same house, and she did not hear any scuffling or other strange noise.

When found, the dead woman was lying on her back, with only such marks on her as are described above. The bed clothes were not tumbled about, but lay smoothly, as if the inmate of the bed only laid down. There were no signs of a struggle, but the mysterious murderer did his work quickly and easily. The murdered woman had been married to Crosby about three years, being his second wife. Her maiden name was Wheeler, and her father and mother were present at the funeral.

Mrs. Crosby's jury brought in a verdict that her death was due to her death by strangulation, at the hands of some person or persons unknown.

Suspicion is of a more serious character, and points to the husband of the murdered woman. Crosby, though probably a good man at heart, was unsocial and rather distant. Four months ago he and his wife were insured in an insurance company formed by the grange, and this fact is made to play a part against him. The pools of blood in a single spot on the carpet, the imprint of the bloody hand upon the inside of the door, and the witnesses who might but did not hear a struggle are all links in the chain of circumstantial evidence. The appearance of the man would naturally lead one to believe in his innocence, more especially when they witness the sorrow with which he speaks of his dead companion. Nor is there anything in their wedded life of injustice or quarrels on either side which would give cause to such a horrible tragedy. Crosby was arrested this afternoon, shortly after the remains of his wife had been interred, by the deputy sheriff, and taken to Jamestown, where he will have a hearing. He was completely cast down on hearing of the suspicions cast on him, which he had not known until arrested. He nearly fainted when the news was told him, and with difficulty could be taken to town.

Little Johnny Glennon's Wonderful Escape.

Mrs. Glennon of 92 Clinton street, Hoboken, left her little boy Johnny, aged 2, sitting near the fourth-story window while she went on an errand on Saturday. Johnny would not sit still, and, seeing some children in the yard, he sprang forward, and, losing his balance, fell head foremost out of the window to the ground, about fifty feet below. His mother's cries on her return, brought the neighbors to her assistance. They rushed to the yard, expecting to find the little fellow's lifeless body, but, to their astonishment, he was lying on the ground, smiling as if nothing had happened.

The Pamrapo Barbarities.

Mr. Thomas Churchill, the Pamrapo hotel keeper, whose posts and fence were mysteriously transformed into seeming barber signs on Saturday night last, made up his mind that the work had been instigated by the local barbers, and so he has turned the tables, as he thinks, by purchasing a tonsorial outfit and starting a bona fide barber shop in his billiard room.
