TEMPLE'S GANG OF THIEVES.

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF A REFORMED MEMBER OF THE BAND.

Horse Stealing Reduced to a System—The Leader of the Gang Directing their Movements from his Quarters in New York City.

BINGHAMPTON, Nov. 3.—There is living in this city a man about 45 years of age engaged in a humble but respectable calling, now a member of a church, who was nine years ago sent to the penitentiary for six years, from a Pennsylvania town, for horse stealing. He was then a member of the notorious Temple gang of gypsy horse thieves, the headquarters of which were in Baltimore and New York. When he was arrested he had in his possession four stolen horses which he was taking to a stock farm belonging to the gang in Maryland. He was lodged in the jail of a border Pennsylvania county, from which he escaped the next day. He was recaptured while he was endeavoring to break the lock of a boat in which he intended to row across into New York State. His trial followed almost immediately, and he was sentenced. He learned a trade in prison, and came out a reformed man. He returned to the county in which he was convicted, and was given employment by a farmer to whom one of the stolen horses belonged. He worked for the farmer nearly a year, married a girl also employed by the family, and then came to this city.

To this man the writer is indebted for the following reminiscences of the Temple gang of thieves, interest in which has been revived by the many cases of horse stealing in this and adjoining counties recently, and by the arrest of Isaac Van Nortwick, a few days ago, with a stolen horse in his possession, after a chase lasting for three days, and extending over a large portion of three States.

William Temple, who died in 1876, aged 65 years, organized the Temple gang of horse thieves in 1869. He had had a long career of crime in England. He was a full-blooded English gypsy, born in a tent, and given the name of the man on whose grounds his tribe was encamped. He attempted to kill a young gypsy girl when he was 18 years of age, and was sent to Van Dieman's Land for life. He escaped as a stowaway on a vessel, and returned to England, where he became a horse thief and burglar. To escape punishment for some of his crimes, he fled to America in 1867. He met many men of his character in the wandering tribes of gypsies in this country, and in two years he had organized his gang of horse thieves. There were twenty-five members of the gang proper, but they had outside workers throughout the Eastern and Middle States and in Ohio. They owned farms in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York. For four years their depredations were carried on against the farmers and villagers with shrewdness that defied detection. The gang was divided into the "prospectors," the actual thieves, the "runners," and the "doers." A prospector was one who went into localities to find out where the best horses were kept, how they could best be got at, and what chance there was to get away with them. The prospector was generally a shrewd fellow, who played the part of a buyer of stock. His information was carried back to headquarters. The actual thieves were bold and quick-witted young men, who were expert in handling horses, and careless as to consequences. The runners stationed themselves near a point where the thieves were to operate, and their business was to run the stolen horses to the nearest farm belonging to the gang by as many different routes as they could take. The doers were men whose duties consisted of altering the appearance of stolen horses as much as possible by clipping, dyeing, scarring, singeing, and other operations after the horses reached the rendezvous. Wagons and harness were never stolen in farming districts.

There were other branches of the horse stealing business carried on by the Temple gang. The "gig-workers" formed an important part of the membership. The gig-worker operated only in cities. He kept watch of physicians with valuable turnouts, and when a physician stopped in a favorable locality to visit a patient the gig-worker untied the horse, jumped into the gig, and drove it away. This part of the business was more risky than any other, yet so expert were those who carried it on that during the seven years' existence of the gang only one of its gig-workers was arrested. His name was Pole, and he attempted to drive off a Dr. Pennybaker's horse and buggy in Wallace street, Philadelphia. The horse was a large black gelding, worth $1,000. As Pole turned from Wallace street into Eleventh, a son of the doctor was walking up that street, and he recognized the horse. He knew his father never permitted any one but himself to drive the animal. The son began shouting, "Stop thief!" and ran after the buggy. A policeman caught the horse by the head, and took Pole into custody. He was sent to the penitentiary.

The "livery racket" was another branch of the business. Two young members of the gang played their game together. They operated in the larger towns. They dressed in the best taste, put up at the leading hotels, spent money freely, and, apparently, were well provided with baggage. They remained two or three days in a town, hiring a livery rig daily, returning it promptly, and paying the price asked for it without a question. Finally they hired the best team in the stable, and when suspicion began to be aroused by their somewhat longer absence than usual, they were miles away on the road to one of the farms. If too closely pressed they abandoned the property. No worker of the "livery racket" in the Temple gang was ever taken.

After the first year of the Temple gang's organization the leader retired from active operations. He occupied fine quarters in New York, where he laid the plans for thieving expeditions, and gave his orders to the members he chose for doing the work. He was nearly 60 years old when he came to America. For four years before he died he was an invalid. It was supposed that he was wealthy, but he left only a few hundred dollars. He had used considerable money in defending members of his gang, who, in 1873, began to be successful in escaping arrest. Temple's money was expended in sending his body to England for burial.

The principal stock keeper of the gang was an English half-breed gypsy named Jake Nole. He conducted the farm in Maryland. Sometimes there were as many as fifty stolen horses on this farm. Nole returned to England with a fortune in 1875. Pete Milestone was one of the most daring members of the gang. He was a full-blooded gypsy, and was born at the foot of a milestone in Leicestershire, England, while his tribe was on the road. Hence his name. It was said that when he was 40 years old he had four wives, all living. He met with a tragic death in 1874, near Bird-in-Hand, Pa. He had stolen a valuable running horse from a gentleman's stable near that place, but the alarm was given by a watch dog. Milestone mounted the horse and rode furiously away. The horse stumbled and fell, throwing its rider and breaking his neck.

The death of Milestone, the return of Nole to England, and the arrest and conviction of a number of the leading members of the gang in different parts of the country, weakened the gang. The death of its leader led to its disorganization. Its surviving and free members scattered over the country, and since 1876 there have been only a few cases of horse stealing in this region, and they have invariably met with speedy detection and conviction of the thieves. The bold operations of the past few weeks, however, show the work of organized experts. It is believed that Van Nortwick was a member of the old Temple gang, and that a master hand is directing the operations hereabout.

The Bones of a Sea Serpent.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

Ellsworth County, Kan., furnishes a new contribution to natural history in the shape of the remains of a fossilized sea serpent of the pre-historic period. The discovery was made three miles north of Wilson, the other day, by a Mr. Sylvester, while ploughing, preparatory to opening a stone quarry.

Having turned over what he supposed was a piece of petrified wood, nearly four feet in length, but which proved to belong to the animal kingdom, further search was made, following up other pieces in continuity, varying in length from one to three feet, until thirty-six feet in all were secured. Not until the head was exhumed was the character of the monster apparent. No one seeing the reconstructed segments of the snake placed in their natural order can for a moment doubt the genuineness of the discovery.

The remains were found only a few inches below the surface, with a thin layer of earth between them and the underlying rock. The length of the head is seventeen; inches width of head, eleven inches; greatest thickness of body about one foot. The line of demarcation between the upper and lower jaws, the head and the taper of the neck, all look serpentine. The passage of the œsophagus through the neck, as well as that of the alimentary canal, some fifteen feet further on in the body, is clearly traceable. The outline of the backbone is distinctly seen in a number of the sections composing the remains. Some of the larger vertebræ are four inches across, and it is about the same distance between the vertebral spaces—or, comparatively speaking, they are the size of the vertebræ of a large horse. A portion of the caudal extremity—some ten or fifteen feet—is missing, having been removed by a previous quarryman, so that the original length of the monster was probably fifty feet.

Judge Joachimsen's New Trust.

Ex-Judge Joachimsen of this city has received a letter, written in Hebrew and on parchment, from the Jewish congregations of Jerusalem, requesting him—in view of the projected emigration of Jews from Palestine to the United States—to act as the representative of the Palestine Hebrews in this country, as Sir Moses Montefiore does in England. Judge Joachimsen is for many years less a citizen, evident of that benefit and he shows with him his interest in the condition of the Palestine Jews. He has replied accepting the trust, was written in Hebrew, and was complimented as an example of pure Hebrew by one of the latest Hebrew scholars in America.

FRANK HARPER'S FLYERS.

Irish King and his Trainer—Another Wonder Said to be Forthcoming.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Mr. Frank Harper, the owner of Longfellow, Ten Broeck, and Jils Johnson, is at home on his farm in Woodford County, apparently very little troubled about the suit which has been brought against him by Harry Colston, the colored trainer to whom he gave the Irish King for faithful service rendered.

Mr. Harper's version of the manner of that gift is somewhat different from that of the trainer. He says that Harry took quite a fancy to Irish King when a colt, and that he (Harper) promised the colt to the boy if he brought Jils Johnson out all right. One day, when Raleigh Colston, a brother of Harry, was present, Mr. Harper gave Irish King to Harry. At this Raleigh said: "Now, you done give him the horse, you ought to give him some money to run him with."

"Never mind that," said Mr. Harper, "I have entered him and I'll run him." He insists that when he gave the colt to Harry Colston he retained his engagements and the control of the horse until they were complied with. As an instance of this, says Mr. Harper, Harry wanted to run the colt at the Frankfort Fair, and he (Harper) wouldn't allow him to do so. He wanted to take the horse to Cynthiana to run him, and that Mr. Harper put his foot on. "The truth is," said the old gentleman, "the boys all know how Harry got the colt, and all about it. He never would have brought that suit if it hadn't been for Raleigh. The stories about my offering to compromise with him, or about my offering to divide with him, or saying anything to him about letting him have the stakes, are all lies. They pulled Jils Johnson, and they know they did. At the quarter-pole Jils Johnson was forty feet ahead. Between that and the eighth they pulled him and he went back. I was looking at it when when it was done, and I told them so."

Upon the subject of his horses Mr. Harper grows enthusiastic.

The old gentleman's eyes glistened as he said: "I believe I've got the finest yearling colt in America. If he ain't a racehorse there never was one. He is by Longfellow, dam Piatina, by Planet, solid bay, with black points and a snip. I call him Fellow Play. He has short legs like Ten Broeck, and a place to carry his dinner. He'll make a horse sixteen hands high. How much do you think he measures round the heart? Well, now, to show you. Longfellow measures seventy-one inches, Ten Broeck seventy-two inches, and this colt now measures sixty-seven inches round the heart. O, he's a daisy! Well, I just believe there ain't nor another colt in America that's equal to him."

"All my horses are doing well," continued Mr. Harper. "They are running out now these fine days. Jils Johnson is coming out of his trouble all right. There's a racehorse, too. He is without exception the best horse I ever owned. I always give my horses trials. Longfellow carried ninety pounds and run a mile with curved shoes on in 1:46. Ten Broeck carried ninety-five pounds and run a mile with his shoes on in 1:46. Jils Johnson carried one hundred pounds and run a mile with his shoes on in 1:47. I think Jils Johnson's mile was a long way the best.

In Her Second Century.

The funeral of Winifred Derivan, an Irishwoman, 101 years of age, took place yesterday from 708 First avenue. Weakness forced her to take to her bed a year ago, and the loss of digestive power prevented her taking anything beside liquids for the past five weeks. Symptoms of consequent exhaustion. She had borne seventeen children, the last when she was at the age of 55. This child is now a strong man of 46. She never took a dose of medicine in her life, never used spectacles, and could see to thread a needle at the age of 100. Her hearing was also good. She came to this country at the age of 85, and up to that time worked exclusively at household duties. After arrival this was not permitted by her children, and she contented herself with knitting.

The Currie Murder Trial.

JEFFERSON, Texas, Nov. 2.—The date of the trial of Currie for the murder of R. T. Porter has been changed to Nov. 26. The Hon. D. B. Culberson, one of the leading counsel for the defence, has to start on Dec. 1 for Washington. The date of the trial was changed by agreement of counsel. Under the new criminal code a second continuance is scarcely possible. The defence will doubtless move for a change of venue, but they are not likely to be allowed, as there is no personal prejudice, but a feeling very deep as to the enormity of this crime.

New Jersey 200 Years Ago.

A deed conveying all the "lands, rivers, and mines, minerals, woods, fishings, hawkings, huntings, and all other royalty" in the State of New Jersey, is in possession of Joseph Riley of Woodstown, N. J. It is dated April 18 1677, and is given under the grant of Charles II. of England to William Penn, Nicholas Lucas, Gowen Lowry, and Ed. Billings, for a yearly rent of twenty nobles ($32 29).
