CAPTAIN WILLIAMS'S TRIAL.

POLICEMAN FLEMING TO BE PUT UPON TRIAL AT ANOTHER TIME.

Episodes in Getting a Jury—Who the Jurors Are—Legal Sparring in the General Sessions—Mr. Bliss Arousing Mr. Whitehurch.

The storm yesterday had an effect upon the attendance at the trial, in the General Sessions, of Capt. Alexander S. Williams, under the indictment for clubbing Charles W. Smith, in Madison square, on the 15th ult. Capt. Williams, in full uniform, sat at the bar with ex-United States District Attorney Bliss and Mr. Elihu Root, his counsel. Just behind Capt. Williams was seated Mr. Samuel Whitehurch, and within the bar, near Assistant District Attorney Rollins, were Gen. Chester A. Arthur and ex-Police Commissioner Hugh Gardner. Later John I. Davenport entered the court room, shook hands with Capt. Williams, and took a chair at his side. Policeman Thomas Fleming, No. 50, who is jointly indicted with Capt. Williams, demanded a separate trial.

The impanneling of the jury was begun at 11:30. The first juror called, James McPyke, hotel keeper, of 35 Clinton place, proved acceptable, and he took the foreman's seat. Chas. L. Schussler, grocer, of 210 Third avenue, and Henry Gerken, grocer, of 102 Prince street, the next jurors called, were as readily accepted for the second and third seats in the jury box. Next Charles J. Triacca took the witness chair to pass an examination as to eligibility.

"Were you not," Mr. Bliss asked, "indicted in the United States District Court, when I was District Attorney, for an attempt to defraud the United States Government out of a part of the revenue due from the firm of A. De Grieff & Co.?"

"I was indicted," Triacca answered, "but not for an attempt to defraud the Government. The indictment was for conspiracy. I was a bookkeeper for the firm."

"The defence peremptorily challenges the juror," Mr. Bliss said, and Triacca withdrew.

Rudolph Pehlemann, real estate broker, of 31 West Washington place, was accepted as the fourth juror, and then James P. Bensell, formerly an officer of the General Sessions under the administration of the late District Attorney Garvin, was called.

"Have you read of the case in the newspapers?" Mr. Bliss demanded.

"I have," was the reply.

"Did your reading affect your mind, so far as Capt. Williams is concerned?"

"It did," Mr. Bensell replied, warmly. "I do not think that I could try the case fairly, because my prejudices are against Capt. Williams." Mr. Bensell was excused.

John M. Goldberg of 175 East 117th street, testified that he is a clerk for his wife in her employment agency there. He was formerly secretary of the New York Relief and Employment Association, at 453 Fourth avenue. Mr. Root asked whether he had read a series of articles about Capt. Williams in a morning newspaper, and whether they had impressed him with an opinion as to Capt. Williams.

"They did, Judge, they did, Mr. Goldberg answered," but it was unfavorable to the writer, because I thought that he showed prejudice against Capt. Williams."

The last juror was obtained at 12½. The jurors were: James McPyke, hotel keeper, of 35 Clinton place, foreman; Charles L. Schussler, grocer, of 210 Third avenue; Henry Gerken, grocer, of 102 Prince street; Rudolph Pehlmann, real estate broker, of 31 West Washington place; Frank N. Reynolds, contractor, of 201 East Seventy-eighth street; Anthony E. McMahon, dealer in beer, of 1 Second avenue; Solomon Stark, dry goods, of 11 Avenue C; Frank E. Bean, tee dealer, of 245 West Eighteenth street; Gustavus W. Bokelot, dealer in cigars, of 843 Eighth avenue; John M. Goldberg, clerk, of 175 East 117th street; William M. Jacobs, machinist, of 356 Third avenue; and Jacob Schleoder, cigar dealer, of 166 First avenue.

In his opening for the prosecution Mr. Rollins said that the charge against Capt. Williams is simple assault and battery. In some respects it is comparatively trivial. The jurors are part of a judicial system that decides issues involving life or death. The highest possible punishment for the most flagrant case of this kind is far less than the average penalty imposed in the court daily. But in other respects it is of considerable importance, and it demands a careful and deliberate judgment from the jury. It touches every man, every woman, the defendant himself, and nearly and seriously the public. It is, of course, of the greatest importance to the defendant. He holds a position of trust, responsibility, and power in this city. He is one of the chief officers of the police. The almost inevitable consequence of conviction, if he be convicted, as he ought to be if he is guilty, would be that he would be shorn of his power and required to retire from the exercise of the important functions that he now enjoys. On the other hand, the case is of importance to the people for a similar reason. He (Mr. Rollins) would not willingly submit to the jury, because they would not serve as jurors at the trial of Policeman Thomas Fleming, that this officer, whatever the testimony might show Capt. Williams did, acted in a forcibly unjustifiable manner in striking Smith down.

"We are not, not to be fair, I suppose," Mr. Bliss rejoined, "for what Fleming did?"

"I don't want to say," Mr. Rollins replied. Then he added: "I suppose not. I do not know that there is any evidence to show that Fleming did Capt. Williams's will, or acted through pre-concert with him."

Mr. Samuel Whitehurch testified that he saw Capt. Williams raise his club. When he looked again the point of the club rested upon Smith's shoulder. A moment later Fleming felled Smith.

"You are a lawyer by profession, Mr. Whitehurch," Mr. Bliss said, "and you have been a farmer on Staten Island. What was your business prior to '72?"

"I decline to answer," was Mr. Whitehurch's response. Judge Gildersleeve ruled that Mr. Whitehurch must answer.

"I was a practising attorney," Mr. Whitehurch said. "I was connected with several other firms. I was an insurance broker before I entered the legal profession."

"Did you ever receive checks drawn upon the Nassau National Bank, to pay the premiums upon insurance policies, from a Mr. Betz, a brewer?"

"I object," Mr. Rollins interrupted, "unless the pertinency of this question is shown."

"I will show the pertinency," Mr. Bliss exclaimed. "Its pertinency is that Mr. Betz gave the witness three checks, to be applied to the payment of three premiums for these insurance policies. This was not done by the witness. A loss was incurred, and the result was a compromise between Mr. Betz and the company. Inquiry showed that the checks had been used by the witness to pay the taxes on his own house. In other words, we wish to show that this Taxpayers' Association, of which the witness is secretary, is an organization that has for its object the payment of its taxes with other persons' money." [Laughter.]

Judge Gildersleeve ruled that Mr. Whitehurch must answer, unless his answer would tend to degrade or criminate him.

"I wish to explain this whole matter," Mr. Whitehurch said. "I was in partnership with the nephew of an ex-Judge. He robbed me, and I failed. I gave Mr. Betz the policies for which the checks were to pay the premium, but when I ought to have settled with the insurance companies I could not. Mr. Betz sent down a clerk to inquire into all of the circumstances, and said that he was satisfied."

"Did you not endorse one of the checks," Mr. Bliss continued, "which were given to you for a specific purpose, and pay it to the Clerk of Arrears of Taxes in this city, on the 10th of July, 1877?"

"I did."

"Do you not know, as a lawyer, that this little transaction amounted to embezzlement?"

"I do not."

"I thought you were not much of a lawyer," was Mr. Bliss's comment.

"I think you are not much of a gentleman," Mr. Whitehurch retorted.

"Did you not have an officer of the Seventh District Civil Court after you once, with an execution upon your body, under a judgment in favor of Alexander M. Price?" Mr. Bliss went on.

"I never knew that there was such an execution out against me," was Mr. Whitehurch's warm response. "I paid the judgment when I got money. Mr. Price was the only one who bothered me about my old business. I have here the receipt that shows the payment of the judgment. [The receipt shown.] A friend went with me to see that I got a proper receipt."

"Were you not competent to get a proper receipt alone?" Mr. Bliss asked.

"I object," Mr. Whitehurch replied. "Do you not think, Judge (turning to Judge Gildersleeve), that objection ought to be made to these irrelevant questions?"

"I do not care to answer such questions. I am not here to be cross-examined by witnesses," Judge Gildersleeve said, sharply.

"What was that, your Honor?" Mr. Bliss asked.

"Oh, only a little matter between the witness and myself," Judge Gildersleeve answered, smiling.

"Did you not at or about the outbreak of the war," resumed Mr. Bliss, "though a naturalized citizen, go to the British Consulate to claim protection as a British subject? What would you say if the person who went with you to the Consulate came here, and so testified?"

"I should say that he is an outrageous perjurer," Mr. Whitehurch shouted. "I was secretary of the district association of my ward, and I can show by its records my conduct in this respect. Besides, I was thoroughly disassociated from serving in the ranks at that time."

J. A. Bagley, a city surveyor, testified to the correctness of a survey of the scene of the alleged clubbing. Mr. Rollins said that through the courtesy of the defence, he had been allowed to use the survey.

Charles V. De Forrest, a clerk in the office of D. G. Watts, President of the Cotton Exchange and Thomas Donlon of 213 East Twenty-eighth street, formerly a worker in J. B. Cornell's iron works, testified as to the alleged clubbing. Donlon was standing near the spot where Smith was struck down. He said he saw Williams and Fleming come up. Williams said, "Move back—you." He had his club by the middle, and struck Smith in the chest with it. He hit him again just above the hip. Smith was driven and pushed further through the crowd, where Fleming struck him on the head with his club. Williams sent a roundsman for water and tried to revive Smith, who was in convulsions. "Did you or Smith go first before the Grand Jury?" Mr. Bliss asked of Donlon. "I am not sure about that. I think, after I came out, I spoke to him in the ante-room, and asked him how his head felt."

"Is it not a fact," demanded Mr. Bliss, "that Smith did not appear before the Grand Jury? Mr. Rollins knows this. I demand the production of the minutes of the Grand Jury."

"I do not know it," Mr. Rollins said, rising. "Might it not be somewhat cleared up by the statement of the stenographer to the Grand Jury, whom I see in the court room? I will ask him whether Smith was in the Grand Jury room and he spoke to Stenographer McKenny." Mr. McKenny says that Smith did not appear before the Grand Jury."

"I demand," Mr. Bliss said, "the production of the minute book of the Grand Jury. I propose to have this witness committed." [Applause from a corner where several policemen sat.]

"If this applause is repeated," Judge Gildersleeve said, pounding the bench with his gavel, "I will direct the officers of the court to eject the offenders."

Donlon, continuing his testimony, said that he had made a mistake. He had seen Detective Pigeon in the ante-room of the Grand Jury, and Smith in the ante-room at Police Headquarters. He had confounded the men and the places.

As Donlon was about to quit the witness stand, Mr. Bliss said that Donlon had made a directly false statement, and the Court should take due notice of it.

Mr. Rollins said that it was misstatement susceptible of rational explanation, and he saw no reason why the Court should take notice of it.

Judge Gildersleeve said that, at any rate, the alleged false statement was made in regard to an entirely collateral matter. He did not think, under all the circumstances, that he ought to take any notice of the subject.

The trial was not ended.

GEVERT GERKEN'S LINEN DUSTER.

The Jury Disagree Concerning $16,800 which he Said was in the Coat.

In the suit of Gevert Gerken, an old man in rags, against John H. and James C. Betts, proprietors of the Eastern Hotel, to recover $16,800 with interest, which Gerken alleges was stolen from an overcoat taken from him in the restaurant of the hotel on July 6, 1874, as security for a plate of pork chops, the defendants produced yesterday, in the Kings County Circuit Court, Mr. Chauncey Shaffer to testify as to Gerken's financial condition in 1872. Mr. Shaffer said that he had known Gerken since 1866, and had acted as his counsel in a suit against the Adams Express Company for money claimed to have been lost by that Company. Gerken got judgment for $5,876. Gerken said that all that he had in the world was in that suit. He had called on Mr. Shaffer to borrow $1,000, saying that he was hard up. Gerken's share of the proceeds of the suit was $2,534. Afterward Gerken send Mr. Shaffer for the whole sum, alleging that the lawyer had kept all. This suit was dismissed.

The defendant's counsel yesterday averred that the story told by the complainant was very improbable. A man who lived in a hovel, slept in a cow stable, moved through the slums of Brooklyn and New York, wished the jury to believe that he carried $16,800 about with him, and had it in the pocket of an overcoat. Why should a man who lived in Delancey street, for instance, have approached the plaintiff, and without provocation, have snatched his overcoat and made off with it? Why should a number of persons in the restaurant, without the slightest provocation, have collected around Gerken and demanded that he should be kicked out? And why should Gerken not have had been uttered? The truth was, the counsel said, that this man, looking like a tramp, had gone into the restaurant and had his breakfast, and was trying to get out without paying for it, and on his way out was accosted by Mr. Betts, who demanded the payment of his breakfast. When Gerken said that he had no money, he was told to leave some security, and, as the defendants had proved, he took an old linen duster. He came back for his coat in October, and after he paid the twenty-five cents that he owed, the garment, which had remained on a shelf under the counter, was given to him. Years afterward he returned and rescued Mr. Betts of having stolen $16,800 from that coat.

Judge Gildersleeve charged the jury that if they held with that Mr. Betts snatched Gerken's coat, and that it contained $16,800, which Mr. Betts appropriated, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. If Mr. Betts took the coat under these circumstances, and afterward the coat was robbed by some one else, Mr. Betts was responsible. But if the plaintiff intrusted the coat to the defendants as security for the meal, and did not give the full value of the security he had, and was induced to do so by false pretences, he could not recover, even though the coat was robbed.

The jury remained out until late in the afternoon, and then reported that they were unable to agree. They stood eleven for the defendants and one for the plaintiff.

Two Mysterious Bullets.

As Ernest Sandermann, who keeps the Ferry Hotel in Ferry place, opposite Hamilton ferry, Brooklyn, was playing billiards late on Monday night with Olaf Thompson of the Norwegian bark skjold, a bullet struck some crockery ware on a table near where Sandermann was sitting, and shattered a cup and saucer. Sandermann did not know at the time that it was a bullet, and after searching for the cause of the breaking of the crockery in vain, he returned to his game. He had hardly taken his seat before another bullet crashed through the crockery, and, whizzing by his head, buried itself in the wainscoting. Neither shot had been accompanied by any report, and both, it is believed, were fired from an air gun by the boys who frequent the ferry house opposite, with the design of assassinating one of the two man who were playing cards. Sandermann believes that the bullets were fired at him, and he furnished the police with the names of his enemies.

Thieves in Her Room.

Miss Nellie Hackett returned to her room at 44 Clinton Place on Monday, after thirty minutes' absence, and found two men breaking open her trunk. She caught hold of one of them and shouted for a policeman, who came in time to give chase to the men and catch one of them in Washington square. The prisoner said that his name is William Gordon, and he pleaded guilty in the Jefferson Market Police Court, yesterday.

Paymaster Staples's Defalcation.

Some years ago the United States began a suit against George W. Quinard of this city and James H. Hoyt of Connecticut to recover the amount on their bond to Samuel C. Staples, a Paymaster in the army whose accounts were deficient. A verdict was rendered for the Government, but litigation was continued until yesterday. Then the defendants settled by paying $7,850.
