WORK ON THE GREAT BRIDGE.

Delay Caused by the Extensive Preparations for Manufacturing the Steel.

The East River Bridge is now ready for the steel superstructure, and although the contract was given last summer, none of the steel has been delivered. The delay is likely to postpone for a few months the completion of the bridge. The contract calls for 5,000 tons of steel, and when it was made it was expected that at least 500 tons would be ready for use the first of this year. In preparation for it a number of suspender ropes were hung upon the cables, the towers were cleared of all rubbish, and were prepared to receive the first members of the superstructure.

The cause of the delay, it is said at the bridge office, is due to the extensive preparations for the manufacture of the steel, which the Edgemoor Iron Company is making. The engineers say that the bridge will gain so much in the quality of the work done by the machines which are being built that they can afford to wait. The first consignment is expected early next month, and then the work of building the superstructure will be begun at each tower and carried both ways. The longitudinal trusses will number four, one for each cable, and will be thirteen feet high. They will be supported every few feet by the suspender ropes, which are fitted into wrought-iron sockets, and these in turn are attached by a pin to the cable bands. There is but one all-steel bridge in this country. That one spans the Missouri River at Glasgow, Mo., and is used only as a railroad bridge for the Chicago and Alton extension. The successful use of steel in that bridge encourages the engineers to believe that the steel roadway of the East River Bridge will be without a superior in the world. The superstructure is to be in two parts, one meeting the other within a few inches over the middle of the river. They will not be joined except with a movable bar, so that, under the influences of heat and cold, there will be no derangement of that part of the structure. The proposals for the pine and oak lumber for the flooring of the bridge are all in Secretary Quintard's hands, ready for the action of the Board of Trustees.

The immediate future of the bridge depends upon the passage of the bill now before the Legislature providing for $2,250,000 more, one-third from New York and two-thirds from Brooklyn. This amount is to supply the sum withheld by the Comptrollers of both cities for interest on the bridge bonds, and is to cover all expenses for completing, equipping, and opening the bridge. It will increase the cost of the bridge to the two cities to over fifteen million dollars. Up to Dec. 31, 1879, $11,332,257.26 had been expended. The trustees expect to sell gores and other pieces of land left in the purchase for $125,000, and devote the proceeds to the construction of the bridge. The bridge bonds after this year will become a burden upon the taxpayers in the matter of interest, which heretofore has been deducted from the proceeds of the sales of the bonds. As the bridge will not return a revenue before 1881 or perhaps 1882, the sum to be raised will not be diminished by the income which is expected to follow its completion. There are many who doubt whether the revenue from the bridge will pay even a small interest on the investment, as the ferry companies are prepared to compete with the bridge in passenger and vehicle tariffs. Some of the most conspicuous trustees of the bridge are financially interested in the Union Ferry Company, and are named in connection with the Commission that will control the bridge business when the structure is turned over to the corporations of New York and Brooklyn.

The Chief Engineer, W. A. Roebling, is still confined to his house on Columbia Heights, where the caisson disease, from which he has been several years an acute sufferer, has kept him a prisoner. His engineers are in frequent consultation with him, but many of the trustees and other officers of the bridge have never seen him. He said that he compared the first structure aloft for the first time from a bed on board of a canal boat in which he travelled from his home in New Jersey around to Brooklyn, his ailment not permitting the jolting of a railroad car or carriage. "It is just as I thought it looked," was his exclamation on seeing the structure. By the aid of a strong glass he now watches from his house the progress of the different parts of the bridge.

The entire force of workmen, numbering about six hundred and fifty, is centred upon the New York approach. A few days ago the foundation of the tower at the corner of Water and Washington streets was laid. The buildings between Rose and William streets have been torn away, the space has been fenced in, and the railroad track has been laid to William street for the transportation of material. The work is thus brought within a block and a half of the end of the approach on Chatham street. The New York approach is nearly twice as long as that in Brooklyn, is much more elevated, more costly, and requires more architectural display. The spaces under the approach have attracted attention as proving possibly useful as another city prison.

Anxious to See Her Husband, Now.

A young woman, who says her name is Jennie McCarty, and that she is the wife of a respected Hartford man, is at the Chambers Street Hospital, suffering from a most brutal beating, inflicted, she says, by Patrick Higgins, proprietor of a restaurant at 19 James street. She says that three years ago she became so jealous of her husband that she left him and came to this city. For some time past she has had a room over Higgins's place. Last Tuesday night she went into the restaurant with a man, and had supper there. She told the man not to pay the bill, as the proprietor was charging double the regular prices. A quarrel ensued, which ended in the man being put out and the inflicting of the beating upon the woman. She says that Higgins pounded her with a clam shell until she was unconscious, and then threw her into a small side room, locking her in. About an hour after midnight a woman opened the door, and an hour or so later she was taken to the hospital. At first the surgeons thought she could not live. She has been delirious most of the time since, but last evening she was able to sit up in bed and converse, although her talk was at little incoherent. At first she said her name was Jennie Wheeler. She gave several other names, too, but when in her right mind stuck to the name of Jennie McCarty. She is about 25 years old, and has been looking for her in this city for several months past, and that she has eluded him. Now she is very anxious to see him.

Wanted---Females.
