CHILI'S NATIVE INDIAN FOE.

THE RACE THAT HAS NEVER BEEN CONQUERED NOR CIVILIZED.

Curious Speculations as to their Origin—Their Annual Festival—Smoking the Bodies of the Chiefs—Courtship and Marriage.

From the San Francisco Bulletin.

The Araucano Indians occupy the southeasterly portion of Chilian territory, bordering the Andes. They have never been conquered, and continual skirmishes take place between them and the Chilian troops on the line, where there has never been peace since Chili became free from Spanish rule. A line of forts, garrisoned, are maintained on the borders, and every few years the line is suddenly advanced into the interior, driving the Araucano back and taking possession of his lands. This advance is followed up by settlers, who purchase large haciendas of the Government. So far the acquired possessions have proved excellent for agriculture and grazing purposes. Some of them are covered with fine forest trees, but no mines or minerals of importance have been discovered, and nothing seems to verify the reports of wonderful gold and silver deposits. The Indians have resisted all efforts to civilize them, and the Catholic Church has failed to subdue their stubborn will or establish a church and missionaries among them. Upon one occasion a young prisoner was taught Latin, educated by the Church, and made a curate. He eventually asked permission, and obtained it, to visit his people, but failed to return. Some years afterward he was again taken prisoner, fighting bravely with his people. Being recognized, he was once more placed in the hands of the priests. He lived but little over a year after his second capture, and died pining for his home and of a broken heart. It is asserted that they worship the sun, and believe in evil spirits, somewhat after the manner of worship of the old Inca races.

So little is known of the Araucano Indians and their customs that but one attempt has been made to publish an account of them, and it has since been found out that the work was full of errors and misrepresentations. But very slight information can be obtained of their history, and they are very reticent regarding their own customs, mode of living, and religion. They purposely mislead one when questioned, and no two of them agree in their accounts. They rarely admit strangers into their territories, though occasionally a trader penetrates a short distance to some friendly cacique (or chief), who may treat him with open hospitality; but, upon the least suspicions or want of confidence, the trader's goods are stolen and his life sacrificed to savage cruelties. Of course, few like to run these risks, even for money. The men are well built, strong and healthy, of average height, brave, of cruel dispositions, and treacherous, their complexions of a copper color. The women are small and with ugly, coarse features and large mouths. Both sexes have coarse black hair and beautiful white teeth. It is said that one tribe exists of lighter complexion and lighter hair, the tradition being that they are the descendants of a long-since German colony; but this is doubtful, as no traces are left of the language or customs of such predecessors.

St. John's Day, in June, is the annual celebration, and is kept up for several days at a time. The particular reason for the selection of this day is unknown to any outside of the race, all attempts to trace it to religion or Free Masonry having failed. It has been stated that some of the oldest Araucano chiefs have acknowledged the Masonic greeting, and one or two circumstances corroborate these reports. It is likely there are rare cases of an imperfect knowledge of the order handed down to the present time; but, if so, how the knowledge came into their possession will never be brought to light, and it must now be nearly extinct. At the trading posts these Indians purchase wheat, barley, coarse cottons, hardware, and other necessary articles. They never purchase goods until after they have bargained for their cattle, which bring from $18 to $28 per head. When the cattle are sold and the purchases made, and everything is packed, they seek out a camping ground, collect together their men, women and children, send for a quantity of aguardiente, or common rum, kill a horse or two, the meat of which they are very fond of, and begin their debauchery, which lasts for days. During this time they drink, eat, and sometimes in their cups quarrel, and generally a life or two is lost. As soon as the liquor has all disappeared, they leave for home, in many cases some of the people dying afterward from the effects of the rum, and, as the Chili soldiers says, "Rum kills more Indians than the army." When they can obtain no liquor from want of funds, they will pawn their silver ornaments, which on no account will they sell. Silver coined dollars is their passion. They do not know the value of gold or appreciate it.

The dwelling of the Araucano is round in shape, with a conical roof, the centre of which has an opening for the escape of smoke. The size is in proportion to the family occupants. It is made of upright posts planted in the ground, and horizontal poles are fastened all around, leaving a narrow place for the hide doorway. Over the poles are tied, one hanging down over the other, bunches of dried grass or straw, to keep out the rain and wind. Some of the caciques are said to possess as many as nine wives, who sleep upon dried hides spread upon the floor, the rest of the family occupying the spare space, the feet toward the middle of the room, where a fire is kept up during wet or cold weather. Men and women bathe every morning at daybreak in the rivers or creeks, and at the trading posts it is said that the women are very cleanly in their cooking, using wooden spoons in place of their hands. The warriors make raids into the Argentine Republic, and drive away hundreds of horses and cattle. When successful, they sell the products of their raids to the Chilians, and, when an opportunity offers, do not hesitate to steal the animals back again to be disposed of a second time. These raids into the neighboring republic are not always profitable. Sometimes the soldiers overtake them, showing no mercy, and slaughtering them indiscriminately, which they can easily do by the superiority of firearms over men on horseback armed with lances. When not engaged in war or hunting expeditions, they delight in stretching out at full length on the ground in the hot rays of the sun. The women do the outdoor work, the planting and gathering of crops, and attend to indoor work as well. Their cows supply the principal wants of the family, and are taken great care of. The husbands are kind to the wives, to all appearance, and the Indians seem very seldom does a quarrel take place among the women.

The men never practise medicine, which duty is left to the medicine women, who use herbs and roots, and when these fail in effect, it is attributed to the tricks of evil spirits. Use is then made of the horn, drum, and incantations, which produce a horrible din. Should a common man or woman die, the body is carried out of camp, and oftentimes cast upon the ground and left there. With the Cacique it is different, for he is believed to be more than a mortal, and can only die by assassination, battle, or by attacks of the evil spirits. The medicine women, when they find all their remedies and arts useless, and the Cacique breathing his last, fly in all directions to escape Indian vengeance, many making their way to the Chili settlements; others, hidden, die of starvation. The neighboring tribes will not succor them, and they are hunted up in all directions. No matter how many years elapse, when caught they must be sacrificed to appease the chief's spirit. When the Cacique is dead, no immediate notice is taken of it, but his body is placed in wickerwork, and hung up in the dwelling under the open chimney, where all the smoke passes over him. The family live in the room, and never remove from it to another dwelling. During the time of smoking the body, the poor medicine woman, or perhaps a wife or two, are subjected at intervals to the torture.

All the Caciques and their followers for leagues away are notified that at a certain moon the ceremonies over the dead will commence, and a great attendance is expected. The women criers and howlers are assembled, and lamentations are kept up without cessation, morning and night. The body of the smoked and dried chieftain is placed in a hollow log of canoe shape, prepared for the occasion, and at the appointed time the funeral cortège prepares for its march. The body is at the head of the column, and surrounded by the women criers, with dishevelled hair, tears running down the cheeks, and agonizing howls filling the air. Next come the wives on foot, the children next, the relations behind them, the rear and flanks surrounded by a large concourse of warriors, armed, and on horseback. Proceeding to some mound, they dig a deep hole, deposit the dead chief under the soil, and heap a pile of dirt over the filled-up grave, sometimes as high as fifteen feet above the surface of the earth. A long pole is placed upright at the head of the grave, and one at the foot. The implements of the warrior rest with him in his grave; his favorite horse is killed, his flesh serving for the feast, his hide, head, legs, and tail remaining. The body is stuffed with dried grass, and when concluded, the horse mummy is tied head and tail, in a standing position, to the two poles. Now the warriors ride around a large circle in rapid succession; each with his drum, show tries to record and imitate the brave deeds of the dead. The Feast of the Medicine Women is then in order. Endless speeches are made, conducted to the stake and securely fastened to it. Savage cruelties are perpetrated upon their bodies. The dry wood is spread about them and lighted, amid the shouts and exclamations of the multitude, who watch their victims as they suffer, and are roasted alive and consumed. This is followed by a banquet upon horse or mule flesh and whiskey. A scene of drunkenness follows for days. At times some warrior will seat himself upon a stone or stump, and his voice will utter screeching or half singing words to the assembly before him. Often he will appear frantic, at other times subdued and quiet. Another warrior will leave the circle, and coming in front of the first, will apparently answer him. Both will then unite in wild wails and cries, the crowd around at last joining their voices. Parties who have seen these ceremonies, and are acquainted with the Araucano language, say they can never discover what is said or meant, and through the Indians could never get satisfactory answers or solve the question.

Marriages have their peculiarities. Some wives become so from gift, or by purchase; others are stolen, and occasionally a wife is traded away. A woman prisoner is highly valued, and commands the best price. The warrior, on his incursions into Chili or the Argentine Republic, kills all the men he can, but saves the females, woman or child. Virtue in the young is not valued, but woe to the wife who commits a fault, for she rarely escapes punishment. In case a warrior cannot bargain for the girl of his heart with the parent, he takes another plan. No matter what are the private feelings of his sweetheart, assembling his friends together, he makes a sudden descent with intent to carry her forcibly off. As this is looked forward to by her people, every precaution is taken to defeat the attacking party. In these encounters men, women, and children go in for a free fist fight. If the lover is defeated it only adds to his fame and makes the girl more valuable in his eyes, and he never fails from time to time to renew his contest until victorious, or the girl has been disposed of to some more successful individual. In defeat the party is sure to be pretty roughly handled, but in success, all opposition being put to flight, the girl who hides herself is sought for, taken forcibly from her hiding place, and without attention to her screams and scratches, she is borne to the horse, where she is bound by leather or hide strings, placed on horseback, and disappears into the woods. In a few days they return again, when presents are exchanged between the two families.

Finding Buried Treasure in Missouri.

From the Pleasant Hill Review.

Mr. J. R. Alexander, who lives about five miles northeast of here, in Jackson County, in plowing a piece of newly cleared land a few days since, ploughed up a box twelve inches long and eight inches square. The plough striking it, burst it open. The contents had been so far decayed that when the air struck them they crumbled to dust. Enough was visible to show that they had been paper bills of one denomination of $100. In the lid of the box was cut in rude letters: "August 23 1864 —$18,000." The story in relation to this is as follows:

Mr. Alexander was a Federal soldier, and at the time of the Lawrence raid was stationed at Osceola. These forces were ordered to Pleasant Hill, to intercept Quantrell. They met him on the west bank of Big Creek, one and a half miles from this town, and dispersed him. Quantrell ordered his men to rally at Smithlin. The Federals remained at Pleasant Hill and were ordered to break up into companies. Mr. Alexander's company mustered five men, whose names were George Gann (who lived in Greenton Valley), Bledsoe, and Lisle (Mr. A. says he forgets the other names), and also a boy 18 years old, captured at the same time. The boy was escort marshalled and sled here next morning for burning to death some women and children at Lawrence. Lisle turned State's evidence and informed on the others, Gann, Bledsoe, and one other were taken to Clinton, court marshalled, and shot. Lisle was taken to Lexington and served in the same way.

Mr. Alexander was marched out to be shot he said he had buried $18,000, which he had taken from the Lawrence banks, on the bank of a creek at the south edge of Jackson County. He told Adjutant-General Doyle that if he would spare his life he would give him a receipt for it; if it should do him (Doyle) any good. Mr. Alexander was present when Gann was shot, and heard this conversation and saw Gann shot. He says Gann died like a brave man, refusing to be blindfolded or to kneel.
