THE LATE ADELAIDE NEILSON.

Mr. Edward Compton's Story—Her Death Caused by the Bursting of a Blood Vessel—Her Will, her Friends, and her Funeral.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—Le Figaro said that "Mme. X., an American actress, had died suddenly in the Chalet restaurant in the Bois de Boulogne, where she was dining with two gentlemen." The statement was untrue. It said that her death was caused by a glass of iced milk, and added that she was to have appeared as Nana in a dramatization of Zola's infamous novel. This was grossly false. Her death was due solely to hemorrhage, caused by the bursting of a blood vessel in the stomach. Her lungs and heart were shown by the post mortem to be perfectly sound. The milk she drank at the dairy in the Bois was not iced, but quite warm. Her companions, Mrs. Goodall and Mr. Compton, drank it as well.

No earthly power could have saved Miss Neilson, although the French doctors should not have left her for an instant when they perceived the cold sweat which had broken out at the first attack. It is the opinion of an eminent medical authority that the doctors were not to blame for treating the case as one of severe indigestion. Usually there is some outward indication of the bursting of a blood vessel, but in this instance none manifested itself. Miss Neilson's mortal agony could not have been prolonged, but it might have been somewhat alleviated.

From the lips of Mr. Edward Compton the writer has obtained a full account of her death. Miss Neilson, her companion, Mrs. Goodall, a lady 70 years of age, and Mr. Compton, who was on his way to Switzerland, after breakfasting together at the Café de la Paix, went for a drive in the Bois. Miss Neilson was apparently in the best of health and in radiant spirits. She said that she had accomplished all that she had set out to do. She had earned so much money that she need never again appear on the stage unless she chose, and her professional career had gained her all that she could desire in position. "There is every reason now," she said, "why I should take a holiday."

She altered her mind, however, about going to a German watering place, and declared her intention of proceeding to Trouville. Mr. Compton was to leave for Switzerland that evening. When they arrived at the lake, after having stopped at the dairy, Miss Neilson complained of a severe pain, and they had only time to reach the Chalet restaurant. She tore off her clothes in a paroxysm of suffering. This was followed by a fit of vomiting. The proprietor went for a physician and brought Dr. Monnier, who found Miss Neilson in great torture. All she could say was, "Oh! la douleur! la douleur!"

From the time of her attack nothing was uttered by her save groans and half-inarticulate words, but she frequently sought her companion's hand, as though she derived consolation from it. The doctor, who applied cataplasms, had no sooner gone than the patient said she did not believe in him, and asked for another. An English doctor was sought, but he was out of town, and Dr. Gautilion was brought to the place. He administered pills and a purgative to be used afterward. Toward bedtime Mrs. Goodall went to the hotel, the Continental, it not being considered that there was the slightest danger, and Mr. Compton and the maid, Anna, remained to watch by the sufferer, who continually asked to be moved so as to alleviate pains and ease her. Toward midnight the maid went into the next room to get a little rest, and Mr. Compton threw himself into a chair near the sofa-bed and gradually sank into a doze, from which he was aroused by Miss Neilson's agonizing groans. She suffered frightfully. Great beads of sweat stood on her brow and rolled down her face. This was doubtless the moment when the blood reached the heart. Anna was aroused and despatched in a flacre for the doctor. After she had gone—it then being about a quarter past 3 o'clock—Miss Neilson seemed to grow calmer, and her regular and agonizing groans subsided into a monotonous and heavy breathing. Her head had sunk back on the pillow, and as it seemed about to slip from the narrow couch Mr. Compton supported it on his shoulder.

Suddenly he perceived that her hand had grown cold and found that her pulse was imperceptible. Still he had no suspicion that anything was wrong until he looked at her face. He had never seen more than one person (his father) die, and he, like Miss Neilson, passed away in an unquiet slumber. The solitary watcher was stunned, but he could not realize the worst. He went into the next room for a glass to hold before the lady's mouth. Meantime Anna had returned with the doctor, and having seen Miss Neilson apparently asleep, she crept away on tip toe, cautioning the physician not to disturb her. Hearing Mr. Compton retire, however, she had entered to replace him. When he came back he found her crying and wringing her hands. He spoke to the maid sharply, but the doctor, who was bending over Miss Neilson's form, looked up at that moment and gravely said, "Elle est morte!"

Mr. Compton broke the disagreeable news to Mrs. Goodall, and friends in London were at once notified by telegraph. There is no truth whatever in the rumors set afloat by the Figaro of the brutal manner of the removal of poor Miss Neilson's body to the Morgue. Everything was done with the utmost propriety, and according to French law. The remains were conveyed to the Morgue in the usual manner, with all decency and respect. The story that the body was packed in a hamper, wrapped in packing cloth, and bound with a rope, is untrue. Moreover, it was not placed in the public room of the Morgue, but in the private apartment set apart for autopsies. The arrest which followed the death was in accordance with French law, and was merely formal.

The remains were conveyed to London. They arrived at Victoria Station on Friday, the day on which took place the funeral at Brompton. The mourners were Mr. and Mrs. Morgan (the lady being a very old friend of Miss Neilson), Admiral Carr-Glyn, an aspirant for her hand in marriage and a devoted and disinterested friend; Mr. George Lewis, her attorney and executor; Mr. Compton, Mrs. Goodall, Mrs. John Wood, Miss Fanny Josepha, and others. The mother of the lamented actress was also present. There was a thousand-fold larger and a hundred times more disorderly crowd than that which attended the obsequies of the late Matilda Heron at the "Little Church Round the Corner." Mr. Edmund Yates's paper, the World, truthfully refers to the crowd or mob as "indecently disorderly." It was with great difficulty that the mourners could reach the grave. But what does Mr. Edmund Yates mean by speaking of Miss Neilson as a "brunette-eyed gypsy girl?" Miss Neilson may originally have been a gypsy, but she certainly came from Yorkshire, where her parents resided on the estate of Mr. Milbank, M. P.

Had Miss Neilson lived she would have made another will, altering the disposition of her estate. The one signed in September, 1879, bequeathes the bulk of her property to Admiral Carr-Glyn, who had previously asked to be allowed to settle £1,000 a year on her and leave her £10,000 at his death. Miss Neilson, who had a great esteem for him, immediately determined to make him her principal legatee. To Mr. Compton she bequeathed £1,000, and a similar sum goes to Mr. Joseph Knight, the well-known critic who writes for the Athenæum, and several newspapers. Mr. Knight is a most amiable and accomplished gentleman, known as "Good-Night" by his friends. At the outset of Miss Neilson's career he encouraged her with voice and pen. A souvenir is left to Mrs. John Wood, and her diamond necklace to Lady Fanny Sinclair, an intimate friend. Miss Neilson's mother is given an allowance derived from the interest of £3,000. There is no foundation whatever for a widely circulated report that Mr. Philip Henry Lee will contest the will on the ground that an American divorce is illegal in England, and that he, as Miss Neilson's husband, has a just claim to her property. Even had Mr. Lee the disposition to do this, his marriage some months ago to Mrs. Thorne would interfere with such action.

Le Figaro announces that it has displayed a portrait of Miss Neilson in its office. The illustrated papers have, of course, published pictures of the beautiful actress, and the London Stereoscopic Company displays a great number of cartes, to which attention is called by a black bordered poster. Next to these are some old-fashioned ones of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who will marry an enterprising young American in the autumn. Miss Neilson arrived at Liverpool by the Abyssinia, on her return from the most prosperous sojourn she had ever known in the United States.

"Next Wednesday," she said with childlike delight, "I shall be in London, and the next Wednesday I shall be enjoying my holiday on the Continent."

On that Wednesday, however, she was cold in death.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Steps Taken by Our Government to Learn the Drift of Public Opinion in England.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 4.—Some weeks ago the Department of State instructed Minister Lowell to ascertain the condition of public opinion in England respecting Anglo-American international copyright, its advisability and feasibility. The views of eminent authors, critics, lawyers, and publishers on the subject were especially to be sought, and in every way possible the status of the question in Great Britain was to be ascertained. The department has not heard officially what action Minister Lowell has taken in execution of these instructions, but it is informed by to-day's cable despatches from London that he has transmitted a circular letter to a number of English authors, inviting communication of their views as to the advisability of an international copyright treaty granting protection to books published in a country having copyright by a citizen thereof. The State Department desires this information as a basis for future action.
