WHO WAS THE CRIMINAL?

A CASE OF ATTEMPTED MURDER THAT PUZZLES THE POLICE.

Would a Woman, Probably on her Deathbed, Falsely Swear in Order to Shield her Profligate Son?—A Mystery of the Tenements.

A boy, known to the police of the Sixteenth Precinct as John Higgins, hurried into the Twentieth street police station at ten minutes before 3 o'clock yesterday morning, his face pale, and blood running down over his white shirt from several wounds in his neck.

"My mother lies around at our room, with her throat cut," he gasped, as he leaned against the rail.

"Who cut her, and who cut you?" asked the sergeant. To this question the boy did not reply, and to other questions he refused to answer. All that he would say was that his mother was at 229 West Nineteenth street with her throat cut. This locality is well known to the police, for it is almost immediately in the rear of the Twentieth street station. No. 229 proper is a grocery store. Back of it, and reached by a narrow alley, is a four-story tenement house, facing west. The house is divided into three parts by halls, having three main entrances. On either side of each hall, on every floor, are many small rooms. It would be difficult to guess how many families live in this four-story tenement house, with three entrances. The place does not bear the best reputation. The police say that they are often awakened in their station house by the sounds of revelry and quarrelling there. The Sergeant sent a detail to the place. On the second floor of the first hall, in a front room, they found a large gray-haired woman in her night clothes lying on the floor. From a great gash in her neck blood was running freely, and had formed a pool on the floor of the poorly furnished room. There was blood on the wall near the door, a few feet from the floor, as if the woman had been hurrying to the door when cut. The room bore evidences of a struggle. Chairs were overturned, and everything was in confusion. This everything was not much, for the room gave evidence of poverty. One eloquent, if silent, witness was a bottle still containing a little whiskey.

An ambulance came from the New York Hospital in a short time, and the woman and the boy were removed to the hospital. The woman was conscious, but could not speak. She was apparently perfectly sober, and did not seem to have been drinking. The boy was intoxicated, and still refused to give any information in regard to the cutting. His greatest desire seemed to be to sleep. House Physician Dr. F. H. Markoe examined their wounds. On the woman's neck, extending from the front clear around to the back, on the right side, was a terrible gash, opening into the floor of the mouth, cutting the jugular veins, and just grazing the sheath of the carotid artery. She had bled copiously, and was in a very weak condition. John Higgins's wounds were less dangerous. There was one on the throat, one on each side of the neck, and one on the back of the neck. The last was quite deep; the first three were superficial. They, like his mother's wounds, were evidently made by some sharp instrument like a knife or a razor. The police at first thought that John Higgins himself was the criminal, and he was entered on the hospital books as a prisoner, and a policeman guarded him. His refusal to tell anything of the particulars of the occurrence added to the suspicion.

The neighbors were questioned by the police. They were all silent. No one knew anything about the tragedy that had been enacted among them. Later in the day, when John Higgins awoke from his drunken sleep and had had time to collect his wandering wits, he was questioned again. He talked more freely. To Sergeant Polhemus, acting Captain of the precinct, he said that about 11 o'clock on Sunday night his father, Jeremiah Dugan, who had been separated from his mother for two years, came to their rooms. They all entered into conversation, and in the course of the evening Dugan sent him (John) out for beer, which he got, and of which Dugan drank two glasses. Dugan and the woman had some words, but the boy said that he did not pay much attention to them. About 2 o'clock in the morning he (John) thought that he would go to bed, and started to do so. Then Dugan sprang upon him, cut him with some sharp instrument, he did not know what; then sprang upon Mrs. Higgins and cut her throat, and then fled. The boy said that he tried to stanch his mother's blood, and then hurried to the station and gave the alarm. To this story he adhered. He said that his mother had, after Dugan's disappearance some years ago, married a man named Higgins. Where Dugan lived he did not know, nor what he did for a living. He seemed profoundly ignorant of everything about the man.

His story was not believed. That a boy of 16, and evidently intelligent, should know nothing of his own father's whereabouts until he appeared was not likely. That Dugan would sit three hours and more drinking beer with his former wife and his son, and then make such an assault upon unprovoked, was not believed. There was evidently some mystery back of it all. The boy's reputation was very bad. Two months ago he was arrested for stealing two packages of dominoes from an old woman who keeps a little shop in Yankee row. Before this he was arrested for another theft. For neither was he tried, and how he escaped is not generally known.

Detectives Cairns and Campbell began work on the case. They looked for the weapon with which the cutting was done, but could not find it. They searched the Higgins premises carefully. The two rooms were poorly furnished. In the bedroom was one bed. It was not possible to tell whether it had been occupied that night or not. The neighbors knew little of the Higgins family save that she was once a Mrs. Hyde, and that her son John's name was Hyde. Hyde died, and about two years ago she married Simon Higgins, a blacksmith's helper. No one in the tenement knew or had heard of Dugan. One result of the search in the house was a photograph. This may prove of use in finding the criminal. Afterward a SUN reporter talked with the neighbors of Mrs. Higgins. To him they were more communicative than to the police.

"Mrs. Higgins was a hard-working woman, about 50 years old," said one; "and she took in washing and did odd jobs, all to support her good-for-nothing son Johnny. She was married to a man named Simon Higgins, but they didn't get along well together. He was a decent man except when he had a little too much liquor in him. He quarrelled about the boy. She thought more of him than she did of her husband, and so about six months ago Higgins went away. We don't know where he went, and he hasn't been seen around here since. The mother has worked hard to support the boy, and he has been willing she should, and he has repaid her by blows. He beat her; and yet she seemed to love him just the same. There's been hardly a night for weeks past that they haven't been quarrelling and raising a racket in their rooms. We got so used to it that we didn't mind it, and so last night when we heard them down there we paid no attention. About 2 o'clock we heard some one go out and go down stairs. Then pretty soon John was heard banging at the door with a brick or a stone, as if trying to get in. It seemed as if the door had been locked on him when he went out. There were plenty of hard words and swearing, and I think I heard him talking with a man. I can't be positive. There used to be three or four young fellows in with him every night. I thought that it was some one of them. The next thing we heard was the police coming, and saying that Mrs. Higgins had been cut and Johnny too. So I suppose it must have been the man that was with them that did it."

"Did you ever hear of Jerry Dugan?"

"Never. I knew she was married before to the father of Johnny, but since she came here, two years back, she has been the wife of Simon Higgins, and Johnny has been called Higgins, too. But that ain't his name."

A 3 o'clock in the afternoon Coroner Herrman arrived at the New York Hospital to take the ante-mortem statement of Mrs. Higgins and her son. The woman lay on the cot in the ward, her throat bandaged, unable to speak, but showing by her bright and expressive eyes that she was fully conscious. To test her the Coroner asked her if she was hurt. She nodded. He asked her how. She drew her finger across her throat. He asked her if she knew who did it. She nodded. Was it Jerry Dugan? She nodded, and her eyes flashed. What did he do? Again the motion of the finger across the gashed and bandaged throat. Then Coroner Herrman wrote the word "Dugan" on a piece of paper, and showing it to her asked if he cut her. She nodded again. Detective Cairns was by the bedside. He showed the photograph that had been found, and asked if that was Dugan, and again the wounded woman nodded. This was all that could be ascertained from Mrs. Higgins, who was very weak and in a very critical condition.

Then John was examined. He did not seem anxious to talk, and when he did talk contradicted himself more than once. The story, as he told it at length to the Coroner, was that he was in the house about 11 o'clock Sunday night, when his stepfather, Jeremiah Dugan, came in and took up something and struck him on the neck. The weapon was either an axe or a knife, he did not know which. Dugan then struck Mrs. Higgins with the same instrument. Both bled badly, and John put a cloth around his mother's neck and ran to the station house. The boy said that he had not seen Dugan before for five or six years, when he left his (John's) mother. Dugan did nothing to support them. There was no one in the room at the time except the three. Dugan said nothing, but seemed very angry. John further said that his father was dead; that his name was Hyde, and that he (John) used to be called by that name until lately, when his mother married a man named Higgins. Dugan was not drunk at the time that he did the deed. Young Hyde, or Higgins, was then shown the photograph by the detective. "That is Jerry Dugan," he said, "the man that cut my mother and myself."

The police are not at all satisfied with this story. Neither are they satisfied that Dugan is the criminal. They cannot find a motive for his returning after five years' absence and attempting to kill his former wife and stepson. It is strange that in a thickly inhabited tenement like the one in the Nineteenth street alley no one saw the man either come or go. There are several strong bits of evidence that point to the boy as the criminal. It was well known that he quarrelled with his mother, and that he was drunk on Sunday night. His mother was found in her night dress, showing that she had evidently not been sitting up drinking beer with the two men. Then the boy's determined silence at first. There seems no good reason why he should have tried to screen his stepfather, who had almost killed his mother, and also attacked him. Naturally he would have been anxious to see him punished. The accusation of Dugan seemed to be an afterthought, when he was in the hospital. The wounds in his neck are none of them serious. It is not likely, say the detectives, that a boy of 16, well built, could be held and four cuts made in his neck, while nowhere else on his person was there a mark. There was only one wound on the mother's neck, but that was a terrible one. But to make it, the would-be murderer must have had a struggle, for the poor woman's left thumb is badly cut, and on her body and arms are bruises. The fact that the mother agreed with the boy in accusing Dugan can be accounted for, say the detectives, on the ground of the great love the unfortunate woman has always shown for her bad son. It is not unlikely that in order to save this son she should turn the suspicion to some one else. There is no proof yet that any man by the name of Dugan exists. The photograph may be of Hyde, the first husband, or of some other. Young John says that Dugan has been in Pennsylvania for several years, and has probably returned there now.

Oliver Cotter's Accuser Absent.

Police Commissioner Jourdan, in Brooklyn, yesterday, took up the charges against Oliver Cotter, the new Excise Inspector, made by William Jacobs, an ex-temperance agent, to the effect that Cotter had taken bribes from liquor dealers to keep their places undisturbed. William Jacobs was about Police Headquarters earlier in the day, but was absent when the case was called, and when he was sent for he returned word that he would attend some other time. Gen. Jourdan then took the testimony of Mr. Cotter's witnesses, who testified that Jacobs was guilty of the offence he charged against Oliver Cotter, and had taken money from liquor dealers on the pretence that he could procure licenses for them for $30, because of his influence and intimacy with Cotter. Detective Dowling testified that he had arrested Jacobs for obtaining money under false pretences, and that he (Jacobs) was held to await the action of the Grand Jury, but was not punished. Gen. Jourdan adjourned the inquiry to bring the men face to face.

The Sunken Anglia.

The Cromwell line steamer Cortes did not bring any of the officers or crew of the sunken Anchor line steamship Anglia, as it was expected they would on Saturday. The steamer left St. Johns, N. F., on the same day that the collision took place, and were not informed of the news until the vessel had reached her dock at Pier 9, in this city. The first officer of the Cortes, contrary to the recognized opinions of shipping firms, say that the crew could not, under the most favorable circumstances, reach this port before five days more have elapsed. The bark Troncate will be delayed by the westerly winds, which now prevail off the coast.
