SECOND WEEK. THE CREOLE. THE CREOLE. THE CREOLE.
A new melodrama of great power, in five acts, by the Author of the "Two Orphans."
Of this drama the discriminating critic of the Home Journal says:
"As an appeal to terror, pity, admiration for heroism, and self-sacrifice in the face of death, it has situations which rival in power and intensity anything in the range of the dramatic repertoire."
This, so far as the management is able to judge, is the verdict of the GREAT AUDIENCES who have witnessed every representation of the play during the past week.
Of the manner in which the play has been set upon the stage the graphic says:
"In the scenery, mountings, dresses, and appointments, even this liberal management seemed resolved on surpassing itself. The eye often involuntarily wandered from the actors to the stage settings, so beautiful and sumptuous were they. The third and fourth acts showed Dixon's pavilion by moonlight and daylight, in a lovely Auvergne landscape, full of warmth and color and tender and greenish effects. Such pictures in themselves are alone worth going to see."
