FRIGHTENED PASSENGERS.

The Ferryboat Monticello Collides with the Winona at South Ferry.

The spring tides are so uncertain in their currents and force that ferryboat pilots complain of the difficulty they have in calculating on them from one trip to another. This is especially true of those tides as they sweep around the Battery.

At 8 o'clock yesterday morning the Monticello of the Hamilton ferry, crowded with passengers, was about to enter the New York slip. The Winona of the South ferry had just entered the twin slip. Many of her passengers were yet on her forward end, and the after part of the boat was lifted above its natural level. This was also true of the Monticello, whose forward part was weighed down with a dense throng of passengers, eager to get off and hurry to their places of business. They stood so closely packed that there was no possibility of sudden movement. The boat was swung northward by the tide further than the pilot had calculated upon, and crashed against the Winona. The deck of the Monticello passed under that of the Winona. The rudder block and some of the braces of the latter were carried away, while the guard rails of the Monticello were torn away to the hood of the ladies' cabin.

"We stood so thick at the front part of the boat," said J. W. Vessey of the Eastern Hotel, "that we couldn't see what damage had been done or what danger we might be in. There was a great surge backward, but no man could act independently of the others. Our movement was backward and toward the south side of the boat. Forward on the boat was a large number of horses that were being brought over to be attached to trucks which are usually left in New York for the night. These horses were nearly knocked from their feet, and there was a scramble of people in among them. Somehow the people on the north side of the boat got back far enough and in time enough to escape injury from the deck of the Winona, as well as from the splinters of the guard rail, as it was swept away. It was an exciting time. A number of ladies fainted, and there were loud screams. The fact is, none of us knew for a half minute what might be the result of the collision. Fortunately, no one was injured, as far as I could learn."

BASE BALL.

The Providence Team Redeem Themselves by Beating the Metropolitans.

Matthews's effective pitching, though poorly supported behind the bat by Gross, was too much for the Metropolitans, and the result was their signal defeat, they barely escaping a "Chicago." The fine play of Say and Muldoon was the feature of the home team's play. Daly, too, proving effective again, as only one run was earned off his pitching. The score is appended:

The Princeton College Club nine, with three substitutes in the field, were badly defeated by Kelly's New York cooperative team yesterday, at Princeton, the score being 21 to 2 in favor of the professionals. Brouthers did some very heavy batting on the New York side.

Driscoll of the old Boston Club has been engaged as change pitcher, and Dungan as change catcher by the Metropolitan Club. It is said that Lewis, late of the Cleveland White Stockings, has been engaged by the club as short stop for the season.
