TRACKED BY A BLOODHOUND.

A QUEER STORY UNFOLDED THROUGH THE WEEHAWKEN MYSTERY.

Missing Bella Knettler, whose Father Said he Thought she had been Murdered, Found Once by a Dog, and Again by a Coroner.

From early in the morning yesterday until late in the evening throngs of people congregated on the sidewalk in front of Crane's Morgue, in Hoboken, and gazed intently down the narrow stone steps that lead to the basement in which was the body of the young woman who was murdered in the woods near Weehawken. Many persons from this city, Brooklyn, and various parts of New Jersey viewed the body in the expectation of recognizing a missing relative. The clothing that had been worn by the dead girl, in order to facilitate its inspection, was arranged on a lay figure obtained from a neighboring dry goods store.

Coroner Wiggins began an investigation on his own account yesterday, which resulted in demonstrating the innocence of Mr. Judson S. Francois of any knowledge of or connection with the crime. The suspicion that had attached to him arose from his peculiar relations to Miss Bella Knettler. She was the daughter of a German florist in West Hoboken. Her father had amassed some $50,000 from the sale of his patents, he having been an inventor. His savings had, however, been almost completely lost by injudicious speculations, and he went into the business of cultivating flowers. In July last his daughter Bella, a pretty girl about 17 years of age, became acquainted with Judson S. Francois, who kept a barber shop in the town, and was also a constable detailed to duty at the Hudson County Court House. Francois was married. The pair were seen frequently together at places of public resort, and their conduct caused much local gossip. On the 3d of February the girl disappeared. Her father suspected the barber of having abducted her, and charged him with it, but the accusation was promptly and emphatically denied. Mr. Knettler, however, was convinced of the man's guilt, and watched him closely, but without getting any clue to his daughter's place of concealment.

About a week later he accidentally learned that a trunk directed to a woman, whose first name was Bella, had been taken by an express wagon from Bergen Heights in Jersey City to a house in Seventeenth street this city. He discovered the house, but when he called and asked for his daughter, the person who kept the place told him that she had been taken away, and was living in Hudson street. The old man searched from one end of that street to the other, but to no purpose, and went back to West Hoboken utterly dejected. While he was reflecting at home over his troubles, it suddenly occurred to him that the instinct of a valuable bloodhound which he owned might assist him in tracing his child. He took an old shoe that had belonged to Bella and rubbed it against the animal's nose. Having secured the dog by an iron chain, he led it, on Feb. 24, to the Christopher Street Ferry, and crossed over to this city and went to Hudson street.

The bloodhound on being allowed to follow its own inclinations ran up the west side to Canal street. There it stopped, crossed the street, and trotted back on the opposite side with its head back toward the ground. In the middle of the block it again returned to the westerly side, and, after running around rapidly for a few minutes, rushed to the front door of a certain house and jumped three or four times against the panels. Knettler noted the building, and, after having left the dog with a friend in the neighborhood, went back to the house and to his great delight found his daughter there. She returned home with him. He strictly forbade her to see Francois, and, to enforce obedience, confined her to her room, securing the door with screws and the windows with bars. Despite these precautions, however, Francois, according to Knettler's story, managed to communicate with the girl. On March 8 she escaped from the house. Her father then began a civil suit against Francois for $10,000 damages for abducting the girl, and also procured his indictment by the Grand Jury of Hudson County. He recently obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the Chancellor requiring Francois to produce the girl, but the defendant made a return to the effect that she was no longer under his control, and that he did not know where she was.

These facts were known through the towns and villages in the northern part of Hudson County, and when the body of the murdered girl was found in the woods above Weehawken, many persons jumped to the conclusion that she was Bella Knettler. The father encouraged this belief until it become so general that Francois's life was for some time yesterday afternoon in considerable danger. Knettler, when he first saw the body on Saturday, could not tell whether it was that of his daughter. On Sunday, however, he freely expressed the opinion that the dead girl was his missing child. His friends called at the Morgue at his instance, and their statements corroborated many of the details on which he had based his recognition. But yesterday he dismissed all doubts on the subject, and professed his conviction that the murdered girl was his daughter Bella. He examined the two switches of hair that had been found in the bush near the scene of the crime, and declared that he recognized them as having belonged to his daughter. He asserted that they had both been made for her by Francois, and that one of them was composed of her own hair, mixed with the hair of her dead mother. The sacque he not only identified as the property of his daughter, but he said that he recollected distinctly that she had made it. Two women who had been sent to the Morgue by him examined a gold finger ring and a piece of an earring that had been picked up near the spot where the body was found, and said that they thought they had seen the jewelry worn by Miss Knettler.

When the report of these identifications reached West Hoboken, Guttenberg, and Union Hill the people became intensely excited, and some of them did not hesitate to threaten Francois with violence. A prominent resident of that neighborhood said that many citizens went to Francois's house during the day for the purpose of compelling him either to produce the girl or admit his guilt. A committee, in fact, called to obtain whatever statement he desired to make in reference to the matter, but his shop was closed, and visitors were told that Mr. Francois was ill and could not be seen. Coroner Wiggins had a long consultation with Prosecutor McGill. As the Coroner was about to leave the Court House with Detective Stanton, whom Mr. McGill had detailed to accompany him, he was met by Counsellor Augustus Riche, who was Francois's lawyer in the civil suit brought against him by Knettler. Riche said that he understood that some action was to be taken against Francois, and he volunteered under those circumstances to prove to their satisfaction that Miss Knettler was alive. She was stopping, he assured them, in a house in New York. Under his guidance they and a citizen of West Hoboken, who knew the Knettlers intimately, went to an institution in this city, where, to their surprise, they found Bella Knettler. The Coroner, who had taken down in his note book a complete history of Miss Knettler from her father's lips, questioned the young woman as to her life, and was satisfied from her answers as to her identity. By a strange coincidence, it was found that she measured five feet two inches in height, which was the precise stature of the dead girl.

During the Coroner's absence many men and women called at the Morgue. Garry Fink, the proprietor of a saloon in Bergenline avenue, near the place where the murder was committed, sent word that on Sunday evening that a man and a young woman entered his barroom, while he was out, and asked his wife for a corkscrew. They had a bottle of Rhine wine, and they drew the cork and drank about half the contents of the bottle. They then corked the bottle again and went away, taking it with them.

Red Bank's Church War.

RED BANK, May 16.—The bolters from the Methodist Episcopal Church of this place, who left that organization something over a year ago, dedicated their new house of worship, known as Grace Church, yesterday. The building is not yet fully completed. The dedicatory sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Upham of Drew Seminary. The most important and peculiar feature of the dedication was that the deed of the church was given to the Conference with the proviso that the building should be used only for the benefit of Grace Church. So the trustees of the church will be the virtual owners of the church, and if the Conference should at any time send them a clergyman whom the congregation do not like, they can refuse to allow him to enter. The split was caused by the Conference sending a minister who was not liked by the people. One or two of the members left the church and those who remained were in constant strife. At last an open revolt occurred, and about one-third of the congregation, representing fully two-thirds of its wealth, left the church in a body. They set up a church in Hadden Hall, and for a year have held services there. The Rev. Zeba D. Norton is the minister of the new church.

KILLED BY ONE OF HIS OWN SOLDIERS.

Lieut. Cherry Assassinated while in Pursuit of a Band of Robbers.

FORT NIOBRARA, Neb., May 13.—On the 10th inst. Lieut Cherry of the Fifth Cavalry, with a small force, was sent in pursuit of four robbers who had killed a half-breed named Rocheaux. Lieut. Cherry rode in pursuit the entire day, and, losing the trail, camped at Sharp's ranch, twenty-five miles northwest of the post. The next morning he divided his command and started east to reach the rations sent to meet him from the post.

About 10 o'clock, while riding along, with Sergeant Harrington on his right hand and Thomas Locke and James Conroy in the rear, a shot was fired from behind, and Lieut. Cherry, turning around, saw Locke with a pistol in his hand, which he pretended had gone off accidentally. When asked what it meant, Locke immediately levelled his pistol and shot Lieut. Cherry through the heart, killing him almost instantly. Locke then turned and fired at Conroy, at whom he had directed the first shot, wounding him and knocking him from his saddle. Sergeant Harrington, according to his own statement, seeing his officer shot down, and a body of men rapidly approaching whom he believed to be desperadoes, but who were, in fact, a party under the leadership of Bodeaux's brother, fled, and, after riding down his own horse and Lieut. Cherry's, which had followed him, reached the post at 9½ o'clock. Locke put spurs to his horse and escaped.

Lieut. Cherry was a graduate of West Point, not more than 30 years old. He had won a high reputation as a soldier and frontier fighter by his conduct in the engagement at Milk River, Col., Sept. 29, 1879, between the Ute Indians and three companies of cavalry under command of Major Thornburgh. He and Capt. Lawson saved the command from annihilation. He was a man of fine stature, six feet tall, and well built, and was engaged to be married to a young lady of a distinguished Pennsylvania family. The motive of the man Locke is not known.

An Eloping Wife Recovered by Strategy.

MILLERTON, May 16.—A few days ago Mrs. Laura Daniels, a married woman, eloped from North East with Carl F. Fish, a travelling sewing machine repairer. They went to Albany, where they were followed by the woman's husband. Mrs. Daniels refused to return to her home. Her mother then preferred a charge against her of petit larceny, alleging that she had stolen a ring of the value of $5. On this charge the elopers were returned to this village. Fish was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary, and the woman was released, going to the home of her mother. Mrs. Daniels alleges that her husband was cruel to her. This the husband denies.

Murdered for Refusing Free Passage.

VINCENNES, Ind., May 16.—Early yesterday morning Joseph Reimers, tollkeeper at the drawbridge, was shot dead by James W. Swallow, aged 18. Early in the evening Swallow, with five friends, had attempted to cross the bridge without paying toll, but was prevented. At midnight they returned, and all paid toll but Swallow, who refused. Reimers struck him on the arm with a cane, whereupon Swallow drew a revolver and fired the fatal shot. Reimers's wife and daughter rushed out of their house in time to see the murderer and his friends running away. Swallow escaped, but a reward for his arrest has been offered.

A.—THE GAUNTLET THROWN DOWN.—To all whom it may concern: I will wager $1,000 that my suits to order for $12 are better finished, finer made, and of better material than any other tailor in this country can make at the same figure. Such deceptions I despise. None but the mean, low, and unscrupulous would practise such deceptions—and there are plenty of them in this country. My suits to order for $12 are the best and cheapest in the world, and cannot be equalled by any other tailor on the face of this globe. Call and see, and be convinced of the truth of my assertion.
