THE LANGUAGE IS TOO BAD.

Only One Police Captain Favors Employing Matrons in Stations.

Commissioner Mason, apropos of the bill providing matrons to take charge of female prisoners in the station houses, recently called on each of the thirty-six Police Captains in the city to answer the following questions:

How long have you been a member of the force?
How long have you been Captain?
How many women are searched in your station a month?
Who did the searching?
Is there any trouble or expense in getting women to do the searching?
What is your opinion as to the propriety of the appointment of matrons?

With but one exception—Capt. Leary of the City Hall squad—all the Captains, in replying to the last question, declared themselves opposed to the proposed measure. The ground of objection in every case was the same: that there is no need of matrons, as, when it is necessary to search a female prisoner, the duty is performed by the station cleaner, or by a woman called in for the purpose; that there is no accommodation for them; that their presence would be demoralizing, and that no respectable woman could endure the sights and sounds to be encountered.

Capt. Bennett, who is now stationed in the Central Office, but who for a score of years had command of a precinct, in his answer to Commissioner Mason's questions, drew a picture of a scene he had often witnessed in a station, with a detailed account of the accompanying dialogue between the prisoner and the Sergeant in charge. Answering the Commissioner's questions seriatim, Capt. Bennett, in his report, says that he has been 33 years on the force and 21 years a police Captain. Hardly two women are searched in the entire city in the course of a month, and the searching is done by women, whose services are obtained at no additional expense. This is his answer to the last question: "I don't think matrons should be appointed, for no decent or respectable woman could stay in a station and hear the language used every night in every precinct by the persons arrested."

Capt. Bennett's estimate of the number of women searched was much too small, according to the reports of the other captains, which give an average of perhaps one a month for every station in the city. They all, except Capt. Leary, sustain him in his statement as to station house scenes. Capt. Leary advocates the measure on the ground only that matrons would be useful in taking care of abandoned babies found in the streets.
