HOUSE OWNERS THAT ARE POOR.

The Condemned Property of Mrs. Burns's Children in Washington Street.

The very old and dilapidated dwelling house at 79 Washington street has been condemned by the Building Department, and the customary notices were posted yesterday notifying the owners and occupants. The agent, Mr. Stack of 18 West street, said: "I am 37 years old, and it was an old building when I was 3 years old. The last owner was Mrs. Denis Burns, wife of a New York fireman. Denis was driver of No. 6 engine, and lost his place for intoxication. He died last October. His wife took to drink, and one of the children died. Two other children, aged 9 and 11, were found neglected while the mother was drunk. The mother was imprisoned, and the children were cared for by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Then the mother died, still owning the property, on which there was a mortgage of $1,000. Then Judge Donohue appointed me to take charge of the children, and Wm. A. Boyd was deputed to sell the property for their benefit. The lot is 20 by 50, and E. A. Cruikshank bought it for $4,000. But he would not keep it, because he said there was a flaw in the title. The cost of the funerals of the mother and father and one child must be paid out of the property, and some taxes are due. The taxes are $120 a year.

"When I got possession I was obliged to pay $340 back taxes to keep the property from being sold by the city. I got the children away from Mr. Gerry's society, and placed them in a boarding house in Brooklyn. There would be but little coming to them if the place could be sold for all it is worth.

"Latterly the tenants have had it all their own way, and most of them are squatters, refusing to pay any rent. I have tried in vain to get them out. I begged them at least not to destroy the property, but I could do nothing with them. All sorts of people have gone in there and squatted and refused to pay a cent. I got some of them out and ordered $200 worth of lumber, and proposed to have the place fixed up and cared for. Just as I got ready to do that I got notice from the Building Department that the place was condemned, and that I must 'shore' and 'needle' and do lots of things that cost money, and I am already out of pocket $40 in my guardianship. I did not want to take the office, but accepted because I was friendly to the children."

Two policemen were stationed at the building, and tried in vain to get the tenants out. They begged and pleaded, and said they were going, and lingered through the day. They went fearlessly in and out over the rickety front stoop that was ready to fall. They passed through the lower hall, where the flooring was broken and would not bear the weight of a heavy person. They climbed the rickety stairs, destitute of balusters and ready to drop with the weight of more than one person at a time. They bemoaned their hard fate at having no money to pay the expenses of moving.

The rooms were of the most wretched description. In the attic Mrs. Catharine Coghlan and her daughter lived in one small apartment coated with dirt in every part. The stovepipe hole in the chimney was broken, and let in the smoke of the tenants below. The floor was covered with rubbish. The bedding was foul, and the ceiling had not one square foot of flat surface. On the wall were grimy pictures of Washington and the Virgin Mary. The surrounding parts of the attic were thick with cobwebs and filth. The roof leaked. The tenants said that every night all sorts of people came in and slept in the halls and on the stairs. The highest nominal rent was $7 a month for two rooms occupied by Mrs. Coyle and her three children, living in squalor. She said she had a bad husband, and was obliged to support the family the best way she could. She had no money with which to move. Yet Mrs. Coyle was cheery, and chaffed the reporter, and the youngsters, toddling infants, though dirty, seemed happy. The tenants lingered long before they could be got out, and the policeman with difficulty kept the neighbors from going into the condemned building.

Wanted---Females.
