STURDY OLD HORACE ALLEN.

He Wheels His Barrow from Ohio and Wants to Enter a Race for Men Over 70.

"I am trying to arrange for a walking match in this city between men 70 years old and upward," said a ruddy-faced old gentleman who walked into THE SUN office with a strong step. He was accompanied by Mr. John Day, an aged and well-to-do resident of Jersey City.

"I am 79 years old," the hale old gentleman continued, "but I won't ask any handicap. All I'll ask is a good show with the rest at the gate money."

He was Horace Allen of Delaware, Ohio, a grandnephew of the original Col. Ethan Allen. Years ago he and Mr. Day were neighbors in the village of Delaware. Mr. Allen was a hemp merchant, with an estate of $100,000, a suit against the village for a good deal of the real estate on which it is built, and a sheep ranch in Texas. When the war broke out Mr. Allen, who was a strong Union man, lost his sheep ranch, and then he was disastrously beaten in his lawsuit. For the past three years he has earned a livelihood by peddling household articles along the country roads near Delaware.

A few days ago Mr. Day answered a pull at his door bell, in Jersey City, and Mr. Allen stood before him, dusty, travel stained, and weather beaten. On the sidewalk was a light wheelbarrow loaded with a tin box of handkerchiefs, hose, needles, and pins. Mr. Allen had travelled with it on foot from Delaware, Ohio, paying his way by peddling his goods and by selling copies of three sets of verses, one on "The Taking of Fort Fisonderogo," another, "James Madison, My Jo Jim, a Relic of Poetry on the War of 1812," and another on the "Death of Gallant Bird." These he had set to music of his own composition, and sang at the farm houses along his route in a voice of great volume, but a trifle cracked. Mr. Day gave his old townsman a hearty welcome.

"I was a little broken down with rheumatism after I had been on the road a few days," Mr. Allen said, "but I remembered a recipe my father had used of poke root and whiskey. Two tablespoonfuls of that a day cured me. I made more money twice over from the sale of my poetry than from my fancy goods. My total receipts in cash were $7, but I took in as much again as that in trade. I wouldn't have known New York. The last time I was here was twenty years ago, when I was doing a rushing business in hemp and came here to make contracts with several merchants. I lived in style then at a prominent hotel. I'm able to take care of myself, and not one of my four married children gets a chance to contribute to my support. My youngest son went as a missionary on Aug. 20 with his wife to China."

THE SEA GULLS ARRIVE.

An Old Baymen Discourses on Their Habits —Where They Stay at Night.

Gulls have made their appearance again about the rivers and waters near the city. Within a few days they have been seen in small numbers. An old boatman in the bay said yesterday:

"Gulls come and go with the regularity of a calendar. We have them six months of the year, almost to a day. Their appearance or disappearance does not indicate either cold or warm weather. They arrive here within a week of the 1st of November, and they go within a week of the 1st of May. No matter whether it is warm in the springtime or backward, whether it is cold enough to snow, or we are having a beautiful Indian summer, the gulls always desert us or come into the harbor at the same time. I suppose their migrations are regulated by the age of the fledglings, or the facility with which they can procure food outside the Hook, or along the coast. It is generally noticeable that the departure of bluefish for the southerly waters occurs about the same time that the gulls come up the bays and along the Sound. They are natural scavengers, and live on carrion or whatever animal matter they can find floating on the waters. Fish is their natural food, and on that they live almost exclusively in the warm months, when they find plenty of it off the coast.

"The most of the gulls about here stay at night somewhere close near the Atlantic Highlands. They are great travellers, and go thousands of miles in a season. Some of those that are seen about here in mid-winter darting about on the cakes of ice, and which people are apt to feel very sorry for, are accustomed to that kind of life all the year around, except during the brief time when they are hatching. It is noticed by baymen that in the dead of winter the gulls are most plenty, and that there is a larger species than those we usually see here. The latter are called Bingomasters, and they beat off the smaller ones and generally get the best of the eatables. It will also be noticed that at that time they screech a great deal. That is because the larger ones are stealing all the food. Those big fellows go away to the Arctic seas in summer time, and only come here when driven inside the bar by hunger.

"It is an odd sight to watch the gulls about dusk. They will be seen to come skimming over the water close to the surface and in rapid flight when the sun is about an hour high. They gather in enormous flocks on the long, broad bay between Robbin's Reef and the Jersey shore. There they frolic about in great glee, apparently having fine fun for an hour, when they start away for their resting places near the Highlands."

Green Ginger.

"I had a long search for green ginger today," said a Jersey City housewife to her husband. "My grocer told me that there was a corner in it, that there were only two barrels in the market, and that those two were held at sixty cents a pound by the barrel. A German grocer said he could not get any. At another store the man said, 'Here, John, get this lady some green ginger.' Hasn't had a piece in the store this season, sir,' was the answer. I stepped into about twenty other groceries, but none of them had it."

The husband wondered how he was to get it in New York, and walked up and down the streets in the neighborhood of Washington Market, inquiring at every stand and dodging into every store that looked as if it ever had kept, or by any possibility might ever keep, green ginger. Things are seen sometimes which least expected. In front of a foreign fruit store in Barclay street a lime basket filled with the root he sought met the man's astonished gaze.

"How do you sell your ginger?"

"Four pounds for a dollar."

"Won't you sell me half a pound? My wife wants it, and this is the only one I have seen."

The storekeeper hesitated before he spoke: "Yes, I know something about such things. They destroy the peace of a family. Better than ginger sometimes."

He gave me 50 cents' worth (half pound) and said laconically, "Ten cents." While the purchaser was commenting upon the low price in view of its scarcity, the storekeeper broke in with: "Cheap! Do you know what that ginger costs here? Sixty cents a barrel. Nothing is paid for but digging and freight. The reason it's scarce is because the negroes down there in Jamaica and the other islands won't work as long as they have anything. A steamer may be going out and ginger wanted, but if those negroes have a bit of tobacco as big as the end of your thumb, or a mouthful of food, or a single copper, you can whistle for your ginger."

Dalmatian Flowers and their Uses.

A dozen huge iron-bound bales in an upper story of 20 Reade street are filled with a vegetable product which at first sight looked like hops. "They are Dalmatian flowers," a representative of Windmuller & Roelker said. "They are the foundation of the various so-called harmless insect powders. They are the flowers of a weed that grows as thickly in Italy as daisies in a New Jersey pasture. The flowers are yellow and almost exactly the shape and size of a daisy. They grow in clusters on a weed that is from two to three feet high. The weeds are broken off and air dried. Then the flowers are picked and sent abroad to dealers, who ship them whenever there is a call, several hundred bales, weighing 300 pounds each, are imported into this country yearly. The flowers are here ground into an exceedingly fine powder. This is put in boxes, and labelled different names, but it is the same stuff in all. It is not dangerous in any quantity that a human being is likely to take. It is said to kill insects by suffocation."

A New Lecture Hall for Divinity Students.

The General Episcopal Theological Seminary will soon transfer some of its class divisions to the new lecture hall in Twenty-first street, near Ninth avenue, which is very nearly ready for this use. It has been greatly needed, as one-third of all the Episcopal candidates for holy orders in the country receive their theological preparation in the New York seminary, under the direction of the General Convention, and with the course of study prescribed by the House of Bishops. The new building, which is of moderate dimensions, being only about 85x30 feet, is exclusively for lectures. Each of its three stories is equally divided into two halls, thirty feet square, separated by a wide passageway and staircase through the centre. The new building rests on a foundation to a legacy given by Mr. Jacob Sherred.
