PICTURES OF LONG BRANCH.

NOT A GAY SEASON, BUT A HARVEST FOR THE GAMBLERS.

The Palace of Mr. Daly—How the Money Won on Blaine's Defeat was Invested—Twilight on Ocean Avenue, and its Revelations—John Hoey's Colony.

LONG BRANCH, July 18.—This is not a gay season at Long Branch. The hotel piazzas do not present a crowded appearance. Formerly the front of the Ocean House looked like a sea of human heads, the lawn was dotted with pretty women, and the merry making ran far into the summer nights. On Saturdays it is lively now. The dance music floats out to the sea, and the crowd of people returning from the races present a picture of action and color, but the sporting men seek the glare of the gambling houses, and this feverish charm stirs their sluggish blood as no woman's smile ever can.

The moon shines high on the water, the band bids to the dance, and ladies float their laces through the gas-lit rooms, and the summer breeze woos with its cooling touch, but the men yawn at the women, the moon, and the sea, and seek only the smile of the goddess chance. They stake their last dollar upon the turn of a card, go home in the gray of the morning, and occasionally, from their desperation, blow out the remnant of their meagre brain.

Fortunes change hands at this Monaco of America, and the talk on women's lips and the thought of men's hearts is the run of a horse on the track and the run of the cards at the clubs. It is a marvel that some one does not open a big casino with dining halls and a theatre and a salon like that at Monaco, where women, too, might squander their wealth and leave their roses in the withering atmosphere of a gambling hall.

The club house at the West End is a bower of beauty—roses everywhere and great beds of geraniums on its fine lawn. It is exciting without and within, and the swell men of Wall street there court the favor of chance that has of late deserted them in the bigger game of "the street"—a game that, like fate, can be permanently beaten only by the dealer.

Still the play goes on far into the morning. The viands tempt the epicurean taste and the bank absorbs the wealth. The owner drives his four-in-hand with a che-el-smile on his ruddy face, and builds a palace for himself in the city by the sea. Churches are all around it, stained windows are in its sides where the sunlight falls in mellow tints across the marble of an altar dedicated to God, a great golden cross, emblem of heaven, a swinging censer, downy cushions, and prayer books chased with gold are there. Beyond are rooms decorated by great artists and furnished by great decorators. Beds canopied with satin and shrouded with lace, furniture upholstered in onyx, and mirrors reflecting the art works of two worlds are there. Outside the rays of a golden sunshine perpetually stream over the entrance to this costly home, and 1 pickets in bronze stand, sentinel-like, beside the carriage stepping stone, whose golden letters indicate to the passer by the name of the fortunate owner. "Daly's Flats" a millionaire was from town calls it.

The story of the fortune entered here is unwritten on marble or in bronze. A statue of the prize, shot of the Republican party should be erected on the grassy lawn, and its famous epitaph, "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion," should proclaim to the sojourners by the sea that the bet of $75,000 won upon its strength built the cottage by its side.

Chelsea avenue, on which it stands, has magically improved within a year, until it rivals in beauty any avenue at the Branch. Many leave the glare of the bluff for the cool shade of this picturesque avenue, with its saintly air of village churches and the black-robed sisterhood in the little home that Mr. Daniel Dougherty left for a summer over the sea. They pause to look at the famous home of the Daly's, and the Leland cottage, that is quite new, and one of the finest-kept lawns in Long Branch surrounding both sides of another handsome cottage, with a mammoth anchor of crimson and green on one side and a great star of the same brilliant colors on the other, and a peacock fowl spreading its parti-colored plumage and tropical birds swinging in gilded cages. Commissioner Coleman rests contentedly on the piazza of his cottage along this avenue, and the pretty children of Congressman Page play around the lawn of the summer home that he rented from Dr. Hunt.

No new summer resorts in this vicinity can undermine the popularity of Long Branch. Its future is great, and it has assumed the substantial character of Newport, affording to property owners a charming winter as well as summer home. The sail on the iron boats is the most delightful out of New York, but the invasion of excursionists is a great detriment to the elegance of Long Branch. Ocean avenue is crowded with cheap stages and Jersey vehicles, and during the hours of the arrival and departure of the boats it is difficult and dangerous to drive along the lower portion of the bluff. From 6 to 7 in the evening, after the excursionists have left, Ocean avenue is scant at its best. The fog of the evening has not yet fallen, the sea is blue as the heavens, and the sun is setting in royal glory behind the Jersey hills. A fine panorama rolls from the West End to Elberon. The real beauty of Ocean avenue begins at the hotels and cottages of the West End. These cottages are the most desirable and comfortable places to stay in Long Branch. They are occupied by families of means, but not of exclusive position. The swell days of hotel life at this place have demolished, and ultra fashionable folk have gone into cottages like the habitués of Newport. They show at the hotels for a morning call, or pause at the piazza to recognize a friend, but they rarely mingle in the gayety of the drawing or the ball rooms.

The class of people staying at the West End has greatly varied within the past eight or ten years. Nothing to compare with the gayety has been seen since the famous summer when Fisk brought down his family, and Mrs. Morrissey's diamonds lighted the ball room, and Lotta frisked like a kitten in brilliant Dolly Vardens about the great parlors, and millionaires brushed against actors, and one could scarcely find room for a chair on the piazza. Later on the faces of wealthy Hebrews were most familiar upon the scene. Now, some sporting men are there and a few well-known faces, but the peculiar vivacity of Bohemia blending with high fashion has left the place. There are landmarks there—people that never go elsewhere except to Saratoga in August. The wife of a speculator is seen at the West End and along the drive and on the stand at the races each day, year after year, and even her gowns become landmarks like heroes; yet she spends the entire winter at the counters and in the fitting rooms of a great Broadway shop, grows bigger and shower as the years go by. One devotee to dress has with her twenty-five trunks and a dressmaker, and does not repeat her toilets. A belle who has done Saratoga for years and the Branch for the past years wears a jacket of crimson serge with tiny gold buttons, after the English style, imported by a great tailor of London.

The quandom king of the dudes is dethroned. He may be seen along the piazza in the morning and on the drive in the afternoon, wearing the same plaid suit, instead of changing his clothes three times a day. He sometimes drives with the pretty wife of a Wall street man behind a pair of Jersey horses. His tandem no longer attracts the attention of the avenue. He has lost heavily at both the track and in other forms of speculation, and now goes to his home for income.

Rose Coghlan passes on the drive, smiling serenely into the face of her good-looking young groom, and the tiny boys of Oliver Doud Byron trundle by in their natty phaeton, drawn by a wee pair of ponies. The aristocratic face of Mrs. George Boker beams from a victoria, the river gray ribbons of her bonnet bending with the silver crown of her hair. The face of a well-known beauty is covered with a grare like the reflection of the sun. It is caused by a scarlet-spotted veil twirled around a scarlet hat.

Leaving the beauty of this grand old avenue, the pageant of carriages turns into the scarcely less famous Cedar avenue and down beyond innumerable pretty homes to the historic grounds of Hollywood Park, where the majestic trees lift their proud heads as they do in the grounds of many an old English home. Open are the gates, and past the quaint lodge, through the wooded avenues, by the hot houses and the flower beds, from morning until night the carriages roll. They pause before a massive bed of scarlet geraniums that looks like a sea of fire, unequalled in the land. People marvel at the novel and exquisite taste of a long, narrow bed representing the size, shape, and delicate mosaic coloring of a Persian rug. It is composed of many thousands of tiny plants, forming the most beautiful piece of floral mosaic work that has ever been accomplished, and offering sufficient inducement for one to visit Long Branch and Hollywood to see it alone. The border is an exact imitation of that of a magnificent Persian rug, and so smooth on the surface that a hand can be passed along it. Other beds of similar size and shape, representing a crazy quilt and other designs in the same mosaic work, rival that of the rug in beauty. The effect from a carriage a short distance away is so charming that it holds the fancy of the crowd of pleasure-seeking pilgrims.

Bizarre the Hollywood hotels and colony of cottages look. It seems impossible that architectural skill could have designed such monstrosities. They are a burlesque upon architecture, and accompanying their object, riety. Americans seek novelty, no matter in what form, and, like children after a band of music, they follow the lead of the crowd. Mr. Hoey has accomplished what few Americans ever do, originality, though the sacrifice be all that pleases the eye. The cottages are occupied by men of prominence, and the hotels offer the charm of exclusiveness.

The actors' colony looks dull, and has greatly changed since the days when Edwin Booth paced moodily up and down the stone piazza of his solitary cottage, that now looks lonelier still, and seems to be unoccupied. The old hut, once the home of poor Edwin Adams, has a tenant, but the newer cottage is closed, and the familiar faces that used to smile from its door have left the stage of life forever.

FOUND HER LOST CHILD.

Lizzie Lechner Home Again Three Years After her Strange Disappearance.

Lizzie Lechner, a twelve-year-old, flaxen-haired German girl, who lived with her mother at 608 East Ninth street, was promised a whipping by her school teacher on Feb. 17, 1882, if she did not have all her lessons perfectly on the following day. Lizzie became so frightened that she wandered about the streets crying bitterly instead of going home. A lady from Pennsylvania named Mrs. Haas met her, and after some hesitation Lizzie said that her name was Amelia Schmidt, and that she had neither home nor friends. Mrs. Haas led her to the home of the Association for Befriending Children and Young Girls, at 138 Second avenue. Here Lizzie repeated to Mrs. Starr, the President of the association, the story she had told Mrs. Haas. She was taken in and cared for. Her friends searched everywhere for her, and Detective Weinberg was employed in the search for several weeks, but no clue was discovered.

On Dec. 1, 1883, Mr. T. d'Huyvetter, a well-to-do Frenchman, called at the institution in search of a girl to take charge of his children. He engaged Lizzie and took her to his home in West Hoboken. On Sunday last he went to Rockaway with his family. Lizzie was playing in the sand with one of the children, when Mrs. Tillie Levy, who had known her before she left home, recognized her and induced her to return to her home.

Lizzie sat in the rooms of her sister, Mrs. Oberender, at 308 East Eighth street, yesterday, and glanced shyly at the reporter.

"I was afraid to go home," she said, "because I thought I had done something to disgrace my mother. I was willing to stay in the institution, and I had a good home with Mr. d'Huyvetter, but I would rather be home, and I will stay home now."

Mrs. Oberender said: "I think the people in the institution where Lizzie was should have been able to identify her. My mother went there the day after Lizzie disappeared and described a scar Lizzie had on her neck, but they said they had no such girl in the place."

HAMPTON PROBASCO'S SWORD CANE.

He is Thought to Have Fatally Wounded Michael Kearney With It.

Hampton Probasco, colored, of Millstone, Somerset County, N. J., in a fight with a party of Irishmen on Saturday night stabbed Michael Kearney, 19 years old. It is thought Kearney is mortally wounded. Probasco was arrested. He has an idea, it is said, that all Irishmen have designs on his life. A short time ago he went to a Justice of the Peace and asked for a warrant against Kearney, saying that he was being continually annoyed by him and several of his companions. His request was refused, and he then made a threat that he would "fix" them if he was interfered with again. On Saturday evening, while he was walking near the canal, he was accosted by Kearney, and it is alleged that without further provocation he drew from his sleeve a sword which had once been in a cane, and making a downward lunge with it, struck Kearney just below the right shoulder. The sword penetrated the lung. On Sunday Coroner Sutphen and District Attorney Steele took the negro to Millstone to have him identified by Kearney, and also to take Kearney's ante-mortem statement. The man was so far exhausted, however, that he could not speak, and it is thought by his physician that his death is only a matter of a day or two. During the melée Probasco made several attempts to stab other men in the party, but succeeded only in striking the other besides Kearney, inflicting a slight flesh wound.

HE WAS JEALOUS OF SMITH.

A Little Chinese with an American Name Tells His Story in Court.

John Smith, a car driver of 38 Mulberry street, was charged, yesterday, in the General Sessions, by Nicholas Young of 12 Pell street, with kicking Young in Park street early on June 27 and attempting to steal Young's silver watch and chain. Young is a blood little Chinese in Christian habiliments. He has Americanized his name as well as his dress. He told of the alleged assault and attempt at robbery.

Then a comely young woman, who gave the name of Mary Ann Young, and admitted that, though she lived with Nicholas Young, she was not his wife, said he came home early on the morning of the 27th git, and remarked:

"Me fixes Smit. No comee foolee around 12 Pell street again."

Young, the witness added, was very jealous of Smith asserting that he had attempted to flirt with the witness.

Miss Nelly Black, a friend, corroborated Mrs. Young as to Young's remarks. The jury promptly acquitted Smith.

Death of Mr. Huyler, the Candy Man.

The funeral of Mr. David Huyler, who died at his summer residence at Ocean Park, N. J., on Sunday, will be held at the Jane street Methodist Church today, at 12:30 o'clock. He will be buried in Hackensack. Mr. Huyler was born in this city in 1818. He learned the stone cutter's trade, but after he married he opened a bakery at Twelfth street and Fourth avenue. This business he moved to the corner of Jane street and Eighth avenue.

In 1877 he determined to go into the candy business, and opened a store at 863 Broadway, where he made a specialty of old-fashioned molasses candy. The molasses candy business grew to a great extent. Branch stores were opened for the sale of this and other candies, and a wholesale business was established. It was made a stock company in 1882. There are thirteen stores under the control of the company.

Mr. Huyler was the President of the Sunday Closing League, and took an active part in aiding the police to do their duty. He was also President of the Jane street Methodist Church for forty-five years. He lived in Jane street until within a year or so, when the encroachment of factories and stores made the neighborhood undesirable as a place of residence, and he moved to 24 West 126th street. His widow, his son, John S. Huyler, and a married daughter, Mrs. Thomas Gaines, survive him. His only brother, Jacob, has charge of one of the stores.

Livingston's Worthless Check.

George Livingston, a bright-faced young man, bought a gold watch and chain and onset diamonds, valued at $455, from Walter A. Doughty, jeweller of 23 Maiden lane, on July 17. He directed that the purchases be sent to him at 39 West Ninth street, and gave in payment a gold check drawn upon the Ninth National Bank. The check was worthless. Livingston pleaded guilty yesterday in the General Sessions. Judge Cowing said that clemency had been asked on account of Livingston's aged mother, but he was not inclined to be lenient. It was not Livingston's first offence. He had been dishonest before, and leniency had been shown by sending him to the Elmira Reformatory. He had returned promptly to his evil ways. Judge Cowing sentenced him to State prison for six years.

Glass in Mrs. Groblewski's Stomach.

The examination of Joseph Groblewski, the Brooklyn saloon keeper, and Winifred Hanley, his servant, who were arrested on suspicion of having caused the death of his wife by poison, was adjourned yesterday until next Monday. Dr. Grote, in his analysis of the stomach and other portions of the remains, found arsenic in large quantities. He thinks the form in which the arsenic was taken was arsenious oxide in solution. No symptoms of arsenious acid poisoning, as corrosion of the stomach were found. A few fragments of glass also were found in the stomach.

It is now suspected that Groblewski's first wife, who died last January, and on whom an inquest was also held, may also have been poisoned, and her body will probably be exhumed.

Sleeping with the Body of a Suicide.

Among the boarders at Mrs. Grennen's house, 35 Franklin street, Newark, were William C. Simonds and Albert E. Folmar, newspaper compositors. Early yesterday morning Folmar went to his room and retired without lighting the gas or making much noise for fear of awakening Simonds, who slept in the same bed with him. At 6 o'clock Folmar was awakened by a fellow boarder. He turned in bed to awaken Simonds, but to his horror he found the latter rigid in death with a bullet hole in his right temple. Simonds was attired in his night clothes, and on the floor was a revolver with one of the chambers empty. He had been drinking to excess for several days and said if he could not stop drinking he would shoot himself. He was 20 years old, and formerly lived in Washington.

Swindler Ward Pleads Guilty.

"Capt." Daniel S. Ward, who has swindled many business firms in this city within the past six months, pleaded guilty yesterday, in the General Sessions, of getting a worthless check for $50 cashed at the tailoring store of Pettus A Curtis, in Union square, in October last. Ward, who says he is a Louisianian, and the owner of a plantation on the Mississippi, is a tall, dark, fine-looking man of middle age. He is said to have been one of a band of incendiaries sent to New York by the Confederate Government, in 1861, to fire the city. Judge Cowing sentenced him to State Prison for three years.

Assaulted His Stepsister.

Agent Stocking of the Children's Society arraigned 19-year-old Rudolph Doebli in Jefferson Market yesterday, and charged him with assaulting his 8-year-old stepsister Emma. On Sunday, July 5, Mrs. Eckert left Emma, Rudolph, and a younger son alone in the house while she went to church, and while she was absent Rudolph committed the assault. Justice Kilbreth held him in $1,000 bail to answer.
