GIN BEATS RATTLER VENOM.

McCONNELL, THE SNAKE-BIT SNAKE CHARMER, WON'T DIE.

He Couldn't Get Drunk, Though He Swallowed Quarts of Spirits—It Was a Black Rattler With a Brood that Bit Him.

The warfare between rattlesnake venom and gin and whiskey that has been going on in the system of Snake Charmer John McConnell since he was bitten shortly before 3 o'clock on Monday afternoon was still raging bitterly yesterday, with the advantage slightly in favor of the gin. The attack of the snake was due partly to the carelessness of McConnell and partly to the maternal instinct of the snake. It is scarcely proper to call McConnell a snake charmer, because the only charm he uses while handling his pets is a lightning quickness of motion and an entire absence of fear of snakes.

He began negotiations with the museum at 831 Eighth avenue a few weeks ago to show there, but the arrangements were only completed when he agreed to sell his den of snakes to the museum people. There were 200 of the snakes that McConnell had collected himself. They comprise the yellow-bellied ones of California, the black terrors from Mexico, and dark brown specimens from Pennsylvania. They arrived on Saturday in a big dry goods box, cut up into compartments, and were tenderly carried to the second floor of the museum. McConnell had guaranteed that every one of the snakes still retained its power of inflicting death, and when two dead snakes were found in the box they were dissected and found to be still in possession of their fangs.

THE RATTLESNAKE MAN.

A box over six feet square and about three feet high, with glass sides, was placed on a carpeted platform in the rear of the second floor, and McConnell picked the snakes out of the dry goods box and transferred them to this new home with as little ceremony as he might use in handling canes.

Among the lot was a nest of baby rattlers, which was carefully guarded by the mother, a five-and-a-half-foot black rattler from Mexico. This old snake was savage in the care of her young, and while they were being transferred she kept her rattles going.

The young ones were put in a little box in the cage, and then the old one, after driving all the snakes from California and Pennsylvania to the opposite side of the cage, buried herself in the black folds of a score of Mexican snakes and sulked. She was out of sorts, and at every movement in the neighborhood of the cage she would raise her tail in the air and rattle it angrily.

There are eight performances in the museum every day, and sometimes more when business is good. The first performance on Monday was at 2 o'clock, and McConnell, in the presence of a numerous audience, lifted a plush-seated chair into the snakes' cage and seated himself upon it. The performance passed off without incident beyond the attention caused by the excited manner of the mother snake. For the first time since she has been a captive she resented with unusual spitefulness the familiarity of McConnell. She refused to remain plant in his grasp, and would not entwine herself in the old gentleman's manner about his neck, or lay her head affectionately against his cheek. McConnell, to demonstrate his mastership, kept at her until she was in a rage. He got out of the cage in safety, however.

Before 3 o'clock a new crowd had collected in the museum, and McConnell started to do his afternoon act. He stepped upon the platform in his street clothes, and was introduced by Joseph McCaffrey, the lecturer. Then he took the chair into the cage, and, sitting upon it with his face to the crowd, thrust his hand into the mass of snakes behind him, and, pulling out a four-foot rattler from California, wound it about his neck. Nearly all of the snakes have been captives for a long time, and are familiar with the treatment they received. But this did not prevent them from rattling and showing other vicious signs of displeasure. McConnell picked up other snakes and twined them around his body, and legs, and arms, and then, lifting a lot of them into his lap, let them crawl all over him. Snakes like the warmth of a man's body. A few minutes after he had entered the cage he was covered with a mass of crawling, hissing, rattling snakes. Some one in the crowd said:

"Which is the mother of the small snakes?"

McConnell had not disturbed the black cluster in which the mother of the young ones was buried, but in answer to the question he thrust his right hand among the folds, and, grasping the big snake, held her up. He had seized her just back of the head, and when he raised her every inch of her sixty-six inches vibrated. She thrust her forked tongue out and the rattles on her tail made such a racket that they were heard above the din of rattling that came from every part of the cage. The same voice in the crowd asked:

"What is that yellow snake over there?"

McConnell turned, and seizing one of the yellow specimens from California with his left hand tied it up until his hand with the writhing snake held it was on a level with the head that clutched the black rattler. The black rather had got her chance. She struck at his left hand, and fastened her fangs in the base of the thumb. McConnell appreciated his chance, and throwing down the snakes he held and fiercely twisting those away that were still crawling over him, he sprang out of the cage.

"I have been bitten," he said to Mr. McCaffrey, he showed the wound, and whipping a bottle out of his pocket he bathed the wound with a preparation he carries. Then he dashed out of the museum to a neighboring saloon and drank a copious drink of whiskey.

Vigorously sucking at the wound, he ran to the residence of Dr. H. O. Claus in Thirty-eighth street, near Eighth avenue. The marks of the snake's fangs where they had pierced the flesh were clearly visible. The flesh about them had begun to swell, and the doctor, after scraping the wound to remove whatever trace of poison there remained near the surface, cauterized it. Then McConnell went to his home in West Thirty-second street. Knowing that his chief hope of recovery lay in copious draughts of liquor, he started in to drink. He had no whiskey in the house, so he began fighting the poison with gin. From that time up to 9 o'clock on Monday, something less than six hours, he drank, according to Thomas P. Farrell, one of his friends, eight bottles of gin. The sole effect the liquor had upon him was to deaden in a slight degree his sense of feeling. His brain remained clear, and he was far from being drunk. The poisoned hand had swollen to nearly twice its natural size, and the flesh near the wound had turned purple. His forearm was also swollen, and shooting pains ran through it.

About 10 o'clock on Monday night he sank into a half-conscious state, and from that time until daylight he was delirious. He slept for a brief period in the early morning, and on awaking insisted upon going out. His sister tried to dissuade him, but he was obdurate. Fearing that he would return to his pets would was sent to the museum to keep him away from the snakes. Sure enough, McConnell walked straight up Eighth avenue, and entering the museum proceeded to the cage where the snakes were. It was his evident intention to subdue the vicious reptile that bit him, for he reached into the cage and, paying no attention to the other snakes, which raised their heads and sounded their rattles, he plunged his hand into the mass of black Mexicans and seized the old mother snake. Attendants forced him to drop her. McConnell's left arm was then almost useless, and although the swelling had gone down and the pain had decreased it was perfectly numb. McConnell returned home with Dr. Killion, a brother of Police Captain Killion, was called in. He dressed the wound and curtailed McConnell's draughts of liquor to six teaspoonfuls of whiskey every hour. McConnell passed yesterday afternoon in a half stupor. He seemed to take no notice of what was going on around him. He wanted to be let alone. His brother told the reporter last night that McConnell was in a fair way of recovering and that his present prostrated condition was due as much to the liquor as to the poison. The liquid that the snake charmer carries about with him and which he thinks is an antidote for the bite of a rattler, he manufactures himself. His brother says it is a decoction of herbs. McConnell has been bitten twice before by rattlesnakes.

McConnell is 27 years old. He was brought up in Lloyd's valley, a lonely part of Pike county, Pa. When he was a boy playmates were few, and he used to amuse himself by hunting up rattlesnake dens and killing the reptiles. He had no trouble in finding them, for the country about his home was very rocky and rattlesnakes were plentiful. He became so used to this sort of amusement that he lost all fear of the snakes. He knew their habits perfectly and frequently handled them. He kept his parents in mortal terror, for it was not an uncommon thing for him to bring a rattler to the house and drop it upon the kitchen floor. His father used to keep a loaded shotgun handy to kill the rattlesnakes that Johnny brought home. When he grew old he collected a den of them. They were a constant joy to him and he was never weary of attending to their wants. He never used a forked stick to pin the snakes fast before he captured them, but used to aggravate them until they struck at him, and then, while they were uncoiled and unable to spring, he would pick them up in his hands. About six years ago he started out to exhibit his pets. He has travelled all over the country, and the specimens of rattlers he has from Mexico and California he caught himself in the old easy way.

John B. Doris, who owns and manages the Eighth avenue museum bearing his name, was very much put out yesterday when his friends went there to see how the injured snake charmer was getting along. The accident didn't happen in his museum. "I've been in the show business twenty-five years," he said, "and I never owned a rattlesnake, never kept one in any of my circuses, and never intend to have one in my museum. When I started in the business, a mere boy, I saw two men bitten and killed. Whiskey was powerless to save them. That settled it with me."

MAYOR GRANT'S SLATE IS READY.

He May Show It To-day—Commissioner Gilroy Shuts Down for a Week.

Mayor Grant made no appointments yesterday, but the idea that he is in doubt about them is a mistake. He has made up his mind whom he will appoint, and the announcements are delayed to accommodate the men who want a little time to get ready to take the offices. This applies to some of them, not to all. There are those among them who were ready at 12 o'clock noon on the 1st day of May.

The talk last night was that the appointments will probably be made by to-day. The Republican Police Justiceship is likely to go to William H. Townley, and one of the others to Edgar L. Ridgway. Register Slevin for Police Commissioner and James J. Phelan for Charity Commissioner were favorites in the gossip.

Comptroller Myers yesterday appointed Armand Wormser fourth clerk to City Paymaster Zimmerman at a salary of $1,500 a year. He is a nephew of the banker brothers L. & S. Wormser, and has been in Wall street for years. The vacancy was due to the promotions of David J. Van Winkle, Thomas S. Prior, and Eugene Conkling, second, third, and fourth clerks, on account of the resignation of Christian Classen, first clerk.

Commissioner of Public Works Gilroy is so bothered by applications for appointments that he has had no time to make any progress in the investigations which he expects to result in the reduction of the expenses of his department and the abolition of sinecures. Yesterday he gave orders that no more appointments should be made for a week. He hopes to thus reduce the pressure of applications, and get some time to devote to business.

Impatient Brooklyn Statesmen.

The Executive Committee of the Republican General Committee of Kings county has endorsed the application of Theodore B. Willis for the Surveyorship, Jesse Johnson for the United States District Attorneyship, Ernest Nathan for Revenue Collector, Michael J. Rady for Superintendent of Federal Buildings, and the applications of other Brooklyn statesmen for minor offices. The committee is restive under the delay in distributing the spoils, and has appointed a special committee to go to Washington this afternoon and urge President Harrison to speedy action. There are indications that the Brooklyn leaders are getting ready for a big faction fight, and that within a few weeks Franklin Woodruff will be forced to resign the Chairmanship of the General Committee.

Market Ferries.

The Aldermen yesterday passed a resolution, offered by President J. H. V. Arnold, establishing a ferry from a point at or near the foot of West Thirteenth street to some point in New Jersey, and another to some point on Long Island for the convenience of transportation of market supplies to the West Washington Market. These ferries have been desired very greatly by the marketmen ever since the opening of the new market, and they will, it is believed, add greatly to the volume of business there.
