NEW YORK, 7; PITTSBURGH, 5.

If the one thing which was in people's minds in this town yesterday morning was the great Sullivan-Kilrain fight, the one thing which filled their souls in the afternoon was enthusiasm over the opening of the new base ball grounds of the New York Club at 155th street and Eighth avenue by the game between the New Yorks and Pittsburghs. The home club made its first appearance after its long Western tour upon the new grounds, which are undoubtedly the finest base ball grounds in the world. The Staten Island field was easy enough of access, but somehow people would not go there.

People were anxious to get up to the game yesterday not merely to see the new grounds, about which so much has been said, but from a desire to welcome the players. Everybody is proud of the work the team has done on its Western trip. The New Yorks have won ten out of the sixteen games played in the West, and they have pushed themselves up to third place from fourth. They are only a very little way from the top now in point of games. That they will soon be at the top is the calm judgment of all New Yorkers.

As early as 1½ o'clock the best seats in the grand stand were taken: an hour later there was hardly a seat on the stand that did not have a man or a woman or a child on it; another hour, and grand stand, field seats, whatever standing room there was, and every inch of ground on the big field not devoted to the players were filled with a tightly packed mass of human beings, into which not another man could be wedged. The capacity of the field had reached its limit, and before the game began at 4 o'clock no more entrance tickets were sold, and entrance was almost denied to the few who had already purchased tickets. There were 8,324 spectators on the grounds.

The great mass of people was an imposing sight. Only the first tier of seats has yet been erected around the field, and over this tier no covering has been placed, so that the people had no shelter from the sun, but simply sat and broiled in it. Nearly every one had a newspaper pinned around his neck. The grand stand from the rear on the top looked like an amphitheatre of folded newspapers with hats on top. The crowd was so big that even the narrow space at the foot of the high fence on the embankment at the northern side of the grounds was crowded with small boys, who seemed to be clinging to the inside of the fence. Inspectors Conlin and Capt. Cortright, with a hundred policemen, kept order, but everybody was good natured. Twenty-five policemen were stationed on the rocks at 155th street, below St. Nicholas avenue, to keep sightseers away.

It was a great day for the elevated railroad. The trains were crowded early in the afternoon from far down town, and in most cases the people who had to accept standing room at Grand or Eighth street had to keep standing till they left the train at the grounds. The new field is much more easy of access than the old Polo grounds. The station at the new grounds is but forty feet from the 155th street station, and, as all know, the elevated trains make the distance in short order. Yesterday excursion trains were run from Forty-second street.

The field extends from the northwest corner of 155th street for 460 feet (two blocks) north along Eighth avenue, and westward from the same corner for 490 feet along 155th street. It is rumored that it is the intention to extend the field 200 feet further north along Eighth avenue, and if this is done it will be a good thing. There is an embankment now on the northern side, where the field has been cut down, and some of the balls batted yesterday hit this embankment. The field now is as smooth as a floor, and is 20 feet below the street. The diamond has been rolled and sodded, the base lines and the outfield covered with cinders. The present field is, of course, much smaller than the old Polo grounds. The dimensions of the Polo grounds were 800 by 460 feet.

The grand stand or pavilion, as it is called, will be when it is finished a thing of beauty. It will be a solid structure, built in a semicircle, at the northwest corner of 155th street and Eighth avenue, and, of course, the home plate is right before the centre of the stand, the batters facing uptown. The pavilion is 320 feet long on the field side, 195 feet deep at each end, and sixty feet deep in the centre. The length of the rear or street line is 410 feet. The pavilion will have two decks or tiers. The tiers will have ten aisles each, and will be supplied with lifting seats. Above the second tier on the rear fronting the entrance will be placed round towers, each surmounted by a flagstaff. There will be in the pavilion spaces for ladies' retiring rooms, dressing rooms for the players, offices, and a restaurant. The approaches to the pavilion will be wide.

The free seats, or bleaching boards, are at the end of the pavilion, and run down to the end of the field. They will hold 7,000 people and the pavilion 5,000. As was said, only the first tier of seats on the pavilion has not been built. The roof will be up by Wednesday, and in two weeks more the pavilion will be completed.

The great crowd cheered like mad when the Giants came out on the field yesterday. Everybody was on the lookout for the presentation to Capt. Buck Ewing of the $2,000 watch which his admirers have been getting for him. President Day made the presentation just as Buck was stepping before the plate to bat in the first inning. President Day handed the watch to Ewing with but a word or two of speech. The watch was a very beautiful one. Its case bore the inscription: "From friends in the New York Stock Exchange to Captain Buck Ewing of the New York Base Ball Club." Then followed the names of the donors, as follows:

"A. King, L. B. Talcott, R. Limburger, J. B. Cushman, J. M. Armory, J. Wallace, H. B. Cash, H. P. Trotlinghan, H. Cruger Oakley, T. C. Buck, J. Goodchild, W. V. Burrill.

A GLANCE AT THE GAME.

For the first time in many a long day a game played about the lines of President Day, his effort to seek fame in the game seemed to be a success, and if the first day is an indication then success for his new ball ground is assured. In this game the New Yorks had the Pittsburghs, lead by Hustling Horace Phillips, as their opponents. The old Detroit club was well represented on the Pittsburgh team. Rowe and White made their first appearance with the team. They, with Fields, Dalton and Miller, made quite an impression. Rowe and White showed up rather rusty, the latter especially showing a lack of practice and his delivery was erratic. However, he did not do much worse than the older players of the visiting team, for, as a whole, their work was far from being satisfactory.

The New Yorks secured all of their runs with the assistance of errors by the visitors notwithstanding they hit the ball at the right moment, and as a consequence their hits were rather more valuable. As for the field work of the New Yorks, it can be said to have been perfect. The only boiling error was by Ward, who had taken up Richardson's place in the field, and although this error was a trifle less excusable, owing to a bad bound on the ball, it was expected that either Richardson or Welch would be in the box for the home team, but Ed Crane, with his badly lamed leg, was sent in, and he did remarkably well. If there ever had been any fear of his not having any trouble with his foot of late, and after his experience while on his trip around the world, all such fears can now be thrown aside, for when the game was over Ed's uniform was soaked with perspiration, and he said that he had never felt the heat so much as in this game. At times he was slightly wild, but only in one inning did his wildness cost anything, and that was in the third, when he gave one base on balls and hit two men with the ball. He never showed better speed than in this game, and he sent the ball to Ewing in good shape.

After the work of Capt. Ewing in this game, it can be said of him that he can catch any man on the ball field. The only error by our Captain was a short passed ball on which a runner stole second, but it did no harm. Galvin and Miller was the opponents' battery. Miller was perfect in his work, and, for that matter, so was Galvin. The old man showed a remarkable degree of head work, and gave no chances for bases on balls. It was probably for this reason that he was hit somewhat harder than he otherwise would have been; still there is no telling as to this, for the champions were out with their sculping knives in full force, and were after blood. The New Yorks would not have had so easy a time had the visitors done better work in the field, still there is not much doubt but that they would have won just the same.

The visitors were not in it during the early part of the game, and when the New Yorks gained the stick down by scoring four runs in the third inning the 8,324 spectators who had been fortunate enough to secure an entrance to the grounds before the closing of the gates settled themselves back as comfortably as possible to perspire, get sun-burned, and enjoy the game. The crowd was the same old Polo ground gathering that has time and time again gathered to see the New Yorks play. It was just as cheerful as in the days gone by, and ever ready to shower applause on the player that distinguished himself by a good play, or to coach a New York player whenever he secured a "life" on a mistake by one of the visiting fielders. They had little time for murmurs of regret for poor work by the home team, for they handled themselves in such a way as to put one in mind of a well-oiled and regulated machine.

THE OPENING INNING.

The opening innings saw both teams doing good work. The play by the home team was a shade the better, being more clean cut and rapid. But little occurred in the New Yorks' first round. Gore fell an easy victim at first on a grounder to Dunlap. The next moment there was a roar and a bang as Tiernan sent the ball skyward. It came down near the deep right centre field fence. Sunday by a long run got under it, and the burst of applause was cut short by the ball dropping in the little right fielder's hands. The force of the ball and the run carried Sunday up the ten-foot embankment. Then Ewing came to the bat, and, after his watch had been presented to him, he hit the ball to Galvin, and went out at first.

It was only by the most clever kind of work that the visitors were prevented from scoring in the first inning. Crane showed a slight degree of unsteadiness. Hanlon and Carroll hits got to the bases on balls, while Sunday in the meantime had been called out on strikes. With one out and two on bases it certainly looked somewhat blue for the champions. There was hope, however, for no one knew how White's retirement had affected his stick work. Everything came out right, however, for the Deacon drove a grounder at Whitney, and he was double up with Carroll. This ended the first inning.

Then came a surprise in a safe hit to left field by Connor. The big first baseman never hits in that direction, and he acknowledged himself that the hit was by mere accident. He stayed on first base until Richardson had been retired on a strike, and O'Rourke had popped up a fly. Kuehne, Ward followed with a sharp ground hit, which Dunlap let go through him, and when the ball had been recovered Connor was on third and Ward on first. Our big first baseman took too much ground and Miller got him between the bases, and he was run down. The visitors had another chance to score in their half of this inning, but they failed to accept the chance. With Rowe out, Dunlap got to first on balls, Miller hit to O'Rourke, and then Kuehne got a Harlem twist on the ball, and cut a line through the grass of the newly made diamond toward right field. It was a pretty single, so pretty that it enabled Dunlap to get to third, while Kuehne was satisfied to remain on first for a short time. He did not stay there long, however, for, with a man on third, it is not much trouble to steal second, and Kuehne did so. Again it looked dusky for the New Yorks, but they got out of it by Crane striking out Galvin. Up to this point the contest had been quite exciting, and the enthusiastic spectators cheered and perspired.

THE FIRST RUNS SCORED.

The run getting began in the third inning, and the errors began to pile up at the same time. Whitney was first at the bat in this inning, but an easy grounder to Rowe settled his chances. Crane, in his usual ease form, dragged his bat up to the plate, and chopped at the first ball that came along. The ball skipped down the left field foul line, and although White got one hand on it, he could not have held it with a vacuum pump. Before he could recover the ball Crane had limped to first base. Gore followed with a pretty drive over second base. Then it was Tiernan's turn to do something, and he did, although it was not his fault. He hit a sharp rounder at Rowe, and that gentleman fumbled it. With three on bases, Miller threw the ball to second, which Gore napped, but the ball went wild, and Crane came home, while the other two men on bases moved up a base each. This move caused a great burst of applause, and the trees in the distance fairly bowed their heads in delight. Hanlon then came to the rescue of the champions by muffing Ewing's fly deep centre field, and Sunday, who had enabled the New York's captain to get to second base, but it also enabled Gore to cross the plate.

Connor came to the front the next moment with a liner at Galvin, Jimmie stood his ground and made a grab for the ball as it went by. He did nothing but injure his left hand, and while he danced about with his injured member the ball was busily dancing out into centre field, and Tiernan and Ewing came home. Richardson, who was next at the bat, got in a timely hit, and O'Rourke got to first on a wild throw by White. Again the bases were full, but notwithstanding this the New Yorks got no more runs in this inning, for Ward forced Connor out at the plate, and Whitney, tenth man at the bat, forced Richardson out in the same way. This was a very fair beginning for the New Yorks as far as runs were concerned, and it looked as though the visitors would not be in it, but they were, for in their half of the third, with one man out, Sunday was hit by a pitched ball, Carroll got to first on balls, and White was also hit by a ball. With three men on bases, Rowe hit to centre field, and two runs came in. A neat double play on Dunlap's grounder by Ward, Richardson, and Connor cut off any further chance for the visitors to improve their score for the time being.

The fourth inning saw some lively work by the New Yorks, and they should have scored, but they didn't. The inning opened with Crane at the bat. He sent the ball into left field for a base. Gore hit a sharp grounder to Dunlap, who passed the ball to Carroll, the latter dropped it, and Gore was safe. Tiernan's foul fly was corralled by Miller, and Ewing hit to left field. Crane, with his lame leg, tried to make home from second on the hit, but he failed to do so, being thrown out at the plate. Connor retired the side on a short hit to Galvin. Only three men went to the bat for the visitors in their half of the inning.

In the fifth inning, with the assistance of Deacon White, the New Yorks added another run to their score. With one out White fumbled O'Rourke's grounder. This file did not seem to be of much consequence at the start, but it proved very costly, for Ward followed with his usual timely sacrifice, and Whitney got in a safe hit to left. O'Rourke was now on third and Whitney on first. Miller threw down when Whitney tried to steal second, and for the second time got the ball wild and O'Rourke came home.

From this point up to the eighth inning it was nip and tuck; neither side scored, but it was only by the sharpest kind of field work that runs were cut off. With one out in the seventh inning Richardson hit the ball in the left field crowd, and by the ground rules which had been agreed upon he got three bases, but when the side was out he was still on third. Ewing made a brilliant catch of a long fly from Carroll's bat, and was cheered to the echo. Up to this point Crane had given Carroll his base on balls for eight consecutive times. Five of these bases on balls occurred in Pittsburgh.

THE LAST RUNS.

The eighth inning saw the last runs of the game. With two men on the New Yorks scored two runs in this inning on a dropped throw ball by Carroll. This play was a peculiar one. Gore hit to Galvin, who in his effort to get the ball fell, and while lying on the ground passed the ball to Carroll. Had the latter held it Gore would have been out. Our lively centre-fielder then stole second. Miller muffed a ball by Tiernan's hit, and then Mike hit the ball toward first base; Carroll and Galvin both went after it, but neither of them got it. A hit by Ewing to right field brought Gore home and a hit by Connor in the same direction brought in Tiernan. As it proved afterward, the New Yorks needed the addition to their score, for the visitors at once came in their half of the inning and added out three runs, two of them earned. Sing on by Rowe and Dunlap, an error by Ward, and a two bagger by Kuehne did the business.

Both sides got in a hit in the ninth inning, but nothing came of it. Rowe ended the game with a long fly to O'Rourke, on which the latter made a very pretty catch near the fence.

The 8,324 spectators rose up in a body and went home, badly sunburned but nevertheless happy.

The ground itself was as hard as could be expected for a new ground; the infield had been nicely sodded, the outfield was composed of bare turf, and was more or less rough. The visitors complained of the glare at about 4, but still it was far superior to the Staten Island grounds. The score:

BROOKLYN, 8; KANSAS CITY, 4.

KANSAS CITY, July 8.—It was a dreary, listless game that the Brooklyn and Kansas City clubs played this afternoon. The weather was threatening and less than 1,000 spectators saw the contest. Sowders started in to pitch for Kansas City, and Brooklyn made their eight runs while he occupied the box. The St. Paul youngster was very wild, and after the third inning he retired in favor of Conway. The Brooklyns did not make a hit off the latter. In the fourth and fifth innings it looked like rain, and the Kansas City players tried to delay the game by throwing the ball all over the field while the visitors intentionally fanned the air.

The rain did not come, however, and after the fifth inning the home players tried hard to win. Caruthers pitched a masterly game, and was admirably supported behind the out and in the field. O'Brien was hit by a pitched ball in the first inning and stole second. Foutz reached first on balls and stole second, Gunson landing the ball in centre field in the effort to head off the elongated first baseman. O'Brien scored on the error. Pinkney went to first on balls, and Corkhill's hit brought Foutz to the goal and Pinkney scored when Visner made a base hit. Corkhill came in on Gunson's second wild throw, and the catcher scored the fifth run on Caruthers's hit for three bases in the second inning, and scored on Long's clumsy handling of the throw in. In the third Corkhill hit for two bases, and scored on a steal of third. Smith got to the first corner on Davis's fumble, and came in on another of Gunson's wild throws. Two-base hits by Long and Stearns and Manning's single earned two runs for Kansas City in the first inning, and in the third Long was hit by the ball, went to third on Hamilton's single, and scored on Burns's out. Hamilton made the last run on his hit, a wild pitch, and Stearns's safe drive. The score:
