SIGNOR D'AURIA IN THE WAY WHEN THE SHOWER DESCENDED.

Says He Was the Victim of a Conspiracy—Some of the Alleged Conspirators Arrested—Leading Italians and Their Newspapers Mixed Up in the Quarrel.

On July 4 several citizens of Italian birth went down to South Beach and dined at the Colombo House, kept by Messrs. Bini and Bessi. Most of them were members of the Society of Citizens of Padula, and others were representatives of several Italian newspapers published in this city. In the course of the day one of the latter, Signor Luigi d'Auria, a reporter for l'Eco, was grievously injured by a shower of soup plates, bottles, and other things hurled by his table companions. Signor d'Auria, who is about 35 years old and lives at 52 East Fourth street, asserts that this attack upon him was due to a conspiracy devised by and executed under the orders of Signor Carlo Barsotti, proprietor of Il Progresso Italo-Americano. He has caused two men, conspicuous among the Italians here, to be arrested for the assault, and last night officers were looking for six others, with what results cannot be known until Justice Tiernan's court convenes at Tompkinsville, S. I., this afternoon.

The Italian press is divided on the matter, and the people likewise. According to those who espouse the side of Signor d'Auria, represented mainly by Cristoforo Colombo, a daily newspaper, the trouble arose out of a satirical paragraph written by d'Auria and published in l'Eco of June 29. Several weeks previously Il Progresso had offered a prize to the most popular President of an Italian organization in America, the decision to be made by votes sent in on coupons cut from the columns of the paper. After this contest came similar ones for the most popular Italian barber in New York, and so on. Signor d'Auria commented lightly on this method of increasing the sale of papers, and wound up his paragraph in l'Eco with an offer of a fine human skull to the most popular undertaker in this city, gravely soliciting votes from his readers. He did not leave a blank coupon in the column, and further avoided committing the paper to his joke by saying that letters might be addressed to "one of l'Eco staff, 22 Centre street." This squib, it is said, angered Signor Barsotti and all his employees and readers. Soon after its publication a letter came from V. Morini, an employee of ex-Consul Riva, addressed generally to the staff of l'Eco. This is a translation of it, with italics, &c., as in the original:

New York, July 3, 1890.

Let none of you, all, without exception, in actual flesh and bones and without skin, fail to be present to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock at the banquet, with music and a pearled shoe at the Colombo House, South Beach, Arrochar Station, Staten Island, where the writer has made arrangements for ALL at the table and counts upon the presence of ALL.

"Failing, you will pay dearly, and let this be a sign of the evil for the present.

Best compliments to all. To-morrow, to-morrow, ah! yes, to-morrow (2 P. M.). V. MORINI.

It has been suggested that this letter might be simply the enthusiastic effusion of the Chairman of the House Committee trying to be funny and impressive about the dinner to be managed by him. Since the terrible events of the Fourth, however, one faction of the Italian residents insists that the invitation was a cleverly constructed bait. They point out the portentious emphasis twice expressed in the word "all," evidently designed to make sure that d'Auria should be included in the company. They infer the worst threats from the lines in quotation marks, originally written by Dante, when it comes to the "ah! yes, to-morrow (2 P. M.)," and they aver that so plainly had the demon of revenge given himself away it was a wonder that Signor d'Auria went down to eat with the Padula citizens at all.

All this ought to be very funny, but it isn't. Ask Mr. Robert de Barrill of 21 Centre street and Mr. Arturo de Filippo of 35 Broadway, lawyers for Signor d'Auria; ask Dr. Angelo Zucchi of 29 Marion street, under $1,000 bail for assault in the second degree; Signor Raffaelo Grossi, merchant, under arrest; ask the editors and readers of Cristoforo Colombo, Dr. Zucchi and Signor Grossi have evident reasons for thinking seriously of the matter. The others and many more actually insist on the interpretation given to Morini's letter above, and regard Signor Barsotti, his editors and reporters, and all his supporters, even to the citizens of Padula, as terrible fellows, and premeditated soup plate and bottle throwers.

However, Signor d'Auria went down to the Colombo House on the Fourth, accompanied by Signor Gatti, a typesetter on l'Eco, and when he went away he was carried away with three very severe wounds on his head and several bruises on his body. D'Auria says that when he went in he was received with marked coolness by the whole party, and that soon after he sat down Signor Gallia of La Frusta ("The Whip"), a humorous paper, uttered offensive remarks relative to l'Eco and its administration. To these d'Auria felt bound to give a dignified but emphatic response, whereupon Gallia and others kept up a bitter fire upon the newspaper. As d'Auria was replying to these things, Dr. Zucchi, who was presiding at the banquet, interrupted, and warned him to stop using such language, whatever it was, and threatened to have him put out of the room. D'Auria responded that that was scant courtesy, or something to that effect, whereupon Dr. Zucchi rose, raised a plate of soup, and fired it plumb at the reporter. At the same time Signor Grossi, President of the Padula Citizens, gave him a flip across the face with his open hand. Then there was a riction. Dr. Zucchi called out in energetic Italian to give it to d'Auria, so d'Auria says, and the whole company proceeded to pelt him with dishes, bottles, and food. He escaped, bleeding and half stunned, and was put to bed in a room in the same hotel. After that, according to d'Auria's friends, Zucchi and his party sent to him a peace offering in the shape of $100 if he would forgive, forget, and say nothing about it. This d'Auria declined.

D'Auria says that he saw Signor Barsotti and his chief editor, Luigi Roversi, sitting on the veranda, and that it was clear that these gentlemen directed the attack upon d'Auria, say that after the affair Signor Barsotti went in and treated the whole crowd of Paduleso and their guests to wine. Cristoforo Colombo took up the affair at once, and has since teemed with articles, editorial and news, affidavits and cartoons, all directed to prove the conspiracy. Il Progresso has been full of denials, most important among which has been an advertisement by Signor Barsotti, in which he denies that he was present, and offers to wager $500 against Cristoforo Colombo's $100 that proof cannot be adduced that he knew anything about the fracas until it was all over. Cristoforo Colombo retorts that Barsotti doesn't pay his bets when he loses, and goes ahead in a page of statements signed by witnesses to prove that Barsotti was a spectator of the whole affair. Among these statements the most interesting is made by the musicians employed by the citizens of Padula to play during the banquet. They tell how they went down to the Colombo House on the Fourth and saw Signors Barsotti and Roversi there. They were dining on the veranda and spoke with the musicians. They remained there all through the dinner. The musicians declare that so great was the confusion incident to the quarrel in the banquet room they can say nothing as to who was the aggressor; they saw Signor d'Auria, all covered with blood, run from the room pursued by missiles of every sort, and Barsotti and Roversi were present and in plain view. While d'Auria was getting away under fire, "Signors Bini and Morini came to us and ordered us to play loudly so as to drown the disorder." The musicians further say that they are good men and true, and make the statement without malice, simply to conserve the truth. The statement is signed by L. Tagliabue, of 626 West Forty-eighth street, and six others.

"Against all this, Signor Barsotti says that he was away on a walk during the disturbance, and knew nothing about it until he returned to the Colombo. His associates at Il Progresso office said yesterday that he went down to South Beach ignorant of the meeting of Padula citizens, and that he had his wife and children with him.

"He wouldn't take his family along if he were bound on a bad errand or engaged in a conspiracy, would he?" they asked. "He never felt bad about anything d'Auria wrote. The truth is, d'Auria insulted the President and was put out. Then they let him come back, and Dr. Zucchi offered to look after him. He responded by gross insults, which somebody resented by a blow. This led to a row, all of which Dr. Zucchi tried to stop. He tried to defend d'Auria, Barsotti treated some of his personal friends at the bar, but there was no significance in the act."

Signor d'Auria is no longer connected with l'Eco. The editors of l'Eco said yesterday:

"D'Auria was a good man, but the Fourth was so hot, you know. He was evidently the aggressor."

Dr. Zucchi was arrested on Tuesday and gave bail at Tompkinsville. Signor Grossi was arrested late yesterday afternoon. They deny any conspiracy whatever, and any assault, as far as they were concerned.

New York Sues an Ohio Man.

COLUMBUS, O., July 17.—The great State of New York to-day sued a citizen of Columbus to recover on a judgment. The action was brought against C. C. Corner, in which $10,000 is asked on a judgment obtained against him on May 8 in the Supreme Court of New York. The suit grew out of contracts made with the State Reformatory at Elmira by the defendant, under the name of the Corner Manufacturing Company, by which that institution was to manufacture brushes of various kinds for the defendant. In the trial the defence was set up that the contract was violated, and that the institution had not furnished the tools and at times specified the brushes for which the defendant had contracts in various parts of the country, and he made a claim of $10,000 damages for breach of contract. The State of New York obtained a judgment, and in the suit filed here to-day the Attorney-General asserts that it is still in force and unsatisfied.

A PLEASANT SUMMER CRUISE.

The Steam Launch Vida Starts For a Month's Trip to the Thousand Islands.

The new steam launch Vida, belonging to F. B. Clark of the Knickerbocker Yacht Club, sailed on a four weeks' cruise on Wednesday to the Thousand Islands, by way of the Hudson River, the Troy Canal to Oswego, and Lake Ontario to the St. Lawrence River. Returning, she will come by the St. Lawrence River, Lake Champlain, and the Hudson River. The Vida is well fitted out with stores, and has sleeping room for eight persons. Mr. Clark takes command, and his companions are Baylies, his elder son, and George Brandreth. Edwin C. Hill of Columbia College is chief engineer.

The Vida was launched on June 30 from the yard of C. L. Seabury & Co. of Nyack. The hull is composed of white oak, with cedar planking, and is varnished above the water line. Fore and aft cabins with plate glass sashes enable her to be used as an open cabin or closed cabin launch. All inside joiner work is of polished mahogany. The dimensions are 72.35 feet, and depth 4 feet. She is fitted with a patent water tube boiler, and a single direct-acting engine of high power.
