EWING STILL A CATCHER.

HE GOES BEHIND THE BAT AND PLAYS AS IN DAYS OF OLD.

The New Yorks Defeat the Brooklyns and Change Places with the Wonders—Boston and Cleveland Also Beaten—Hard-fought Games All Around—Gossip.

The feature in baseball yesterday was the way in which Buck Ewing went behind the bat for the New Yorks and played in his old-time form. The results of the games follow:

Philadelphia, 6; Boston, 3.
Baltimore, 7; Washington, 2.
Pittsburg, 5; St. Louis, 3.
Cincinnati, 6; Cleveland, 5.

NEW YORK, 4; BROOKLYN, 1.

To the followers of baseball who like to see a well-played game well won the victory gained by the New Yorks over the Wonders at Eastern Park yesterday must be pleasing; but particularly so must it be to the admirers of the local team who have followed their favorites through every adversity. In a review of the contest Ward finding it decidedly out of place, for neither did he play poorly, on the other hand, each played hard and well for victory. To the excellent pitching of Rusie must be ascribed much of the Brooklyn's defeat. The man from Indiana was at his best. Not once did he weaken, and each succeeding inning found him stronger than ever, the last three being fanning exhibitions. Today that his work behind the bat was a surprise to friends and foes alike would be expressing it but too mildly. Buck's throwing to bases was in the nature of a revelation to the many persons who have regarded him in the nature of a back number. His throwing was easy and direct, and in consequence was generously and freely applauded. Ewing's so-called glass arm must have been left at home. Certainly he did not have it with him when he picked up Corcoran's little hunt and threw to Tiernan out at first. Neither did he when John Ward thought he had a cinch in getting to the second bag and found the ball, thrown by Buck with unerring aim, in Fuller's hands.

Ewing's example was studiously followed by his mates. Tom Shorty Fuller wild throw ultimately gave Brooklyn a run, but that was seen forgotten in the general excellence of the play. Shorty himself amply atoned for that one error. In the last inning three fly balls were sent up in succession, and each and every one was nicely caught by Fuller, second catch was a remarkable one. Tom Daly hit the ball beyond short field. It was too near to be caught by Harry Lyons, though he made a run for it. Hardie Richardson, who took O'Rourke's place at the expiration of the first inning, also made for the ball. Both thought Fuller out of the question, for both called off their men. Fuller, however, who was running with the ball, suddenly gave a leap into the air, half turned around, reached for the ball and clutched it tightly. Then he came down, ball in hand. The applause which greeted him assured him that he had made a record-breaking catch.

If the Brooklyns showed a weakness at the bat, their fielding was of an order in which at least ordinary strength must be noted. Two errors complete the sum total of displays. Both of these were instrumental in Ward's run getting, but neither affected the result of the contest. At other times the work of the entire team was uniform and in keeping with what has been done by the Brooklyns almost right along. John Ward was evidently determined to show that he could field as well as ever, with the man who had succeeded him as captain of the New Yorks. Ward had no less than twelve chances and he accepted them all. Besides, he was the only Brooklynite who successfully sized up Rusie's pitching, although Grillin made one hit. Ward hit safely three times.

Not with the winning game did a run come in. The Brooklyns had a glorious chance to score in the first, but they were unable to pass third. With two out Ward singled, was advanced to third on a passed ball, and was safe by a small margin, as Ewing was quick in his putting the ball into Denny Lyons's hands. Brouthers went to first on balls and stole second while Rusie was getting ready to pitch. Burns, however, hit to Denny Lyons, and a good throw put him out at first. When the run did come in in the third inning Rusie was responsible for it.

Boyle had made the first out by sending up a fly to Ward when Rusie stepped to the plate. Stein gave Amos a chance and the ball went over Corcoran's head. It was a base hit from an unlooked-for source, and Judge Cullom and the heavy of New Yorkers who had left the New York's bench set up such a cry of joy that the sound was waited out to Jamaica Bay, and made the yachtsmen imagine that a revival meeting of the old wholesome kind was going on somewhere. Fuller showed Rusie along by making a sacrifice, on which he was thrown out at first by Ward. Rusie's base running had something to do with the prevention of a double play. Burke astonished Brouthers by letting him have the ball right in his hands. The hit was so hard that Dan was dazed. He dropped the ball and couldn't for the life of him recollect just where it had gone. This was fortunate for the New Yorks, for Rusie, taking advantage of the first baseman's condition, crossed the plate.

In this same inning a wild throw by Fuller allowed Griffin to take his base, Corcoran made a bunt which under ordinary conditions would have been safe. Ewing was right there, however, and Tommy's effort could only count for a sacrifice, as Ewing's quick pick-up was too much for him. Ward smashed the ball out to left field, and Griffin sailed home. Ward tried to steal second on the hit, but Ewing's throw was a little too quick for him.

Ewing hit the ball to centre field in the fourth and attempted to make second. Griffin returned the ball to Ward and John touched Buck out, spoiling a two-bagger.

In the Brooklyns half of the inning a fumble by Tiernan gave Lyons a safe base, but a double play cut short a run. Darby O'Brien hit to Rusie and Amos threw to Burke, forcing Daly out. Burke was not slow in doubling up O'Brien at first.

It was evident when the fifth appeared that the game had settled down into a steady, stubborn combat. Hardie Richardson hit past Stein and Daly was slow in getting the ball, and, moreover, he made a bad throw when he did get it. Boyle, like a sensible fellow, sacrificed. Rusie came to the front once again. His swift-going grounder evaded Brouthers's grasp, and was the means of scoring Richardson.

The New Yorks were now ahead, but they could not resist the temptation to make a sure thing of it, especially as their opponents had very nearly scored in the fifth. Ewing's throwing out of Stein at third was the only thing that prevented the score from being tied in the latter inning. So after Stein gave Mike Tiernan the only base on balls that he gave during the game, Mike made a steal of second. Ewing came to the scratch with a sacrifice, and on Denny Lyons's single between short and second Tiernan ran in.

Again in the sixth, was Ewing a prominent factor in retiring the Brooklynites. John Ward led off with his third successive base hit. The tall went so far away from first that by the time Boyle could get it Ward had reached first. Brouthers was a disappointment. He could only fly out to Harry Lyons. Burns forced Ward out at second. In an attempt to steal Burns was ruthlessly thrown out by Ewing.

With two out Fuller singled in the seventh, but was caught trying to purloin second. Fly balls were the Brooklyns' Jonah in the seventh. Boyle caught two of them. Harry Lyons took the other after a very hard run.

Remembering that their opponents were last at the bat, the visitors set to opportunitly so by without trying to add to their score. Burke, who played a very steady game at second, began the fun in the eighth. Resent the ball directly over second base, and was safe, in spite of Ward and Corcoran's desperate attempts to stop the ball. Daly Lyons hunted, but was low seized the ball and hurled it at Brouthers. The big first baseman got the ball right in his hands, but he lamentably muffed it. Burke passed second with startling swiftness and succeeded in getting to third, and Tiernan's long fly to left gave Burke a chance to sprint home. Ewing sacrificed once again, but Denny Lyons went out, Daly to Brouthers. Daly really threw wild, but Dan got the ball.

A strike out, a base on balls, and then a succession of flys sums up the home team's half of the eighth. Brilliant playing characterized the ninth inning. Richardson flied out to Corcoran, Boyle hit safely, but was quickly put out at second when Rusie sent the ball to Corcoran. Ward, who made the last put out, completed a fine play by rounding up Amos at first. The Brooklyn's half of the last inning was without result on account of Fuller's catching proclivities. It is safe to say that at Eastern Park this afternoon, and the players will have a renewed interest in a victory. The score:
