STORIES OF IRISH MAGIC.

CAILLY COO-COO OF THE WOODS.

The Fairy Princess of Connaught Who Saved the Enchanted Husband.

Copyright, 1901, by Seumas MacManus.

[illegible] there were a King and [illegible] Queen of Connaught and they had three daughters. Five had also a [illegible] one was set in it. [illegible] anything you wished for, [illegible] locked up in a room [illegible] never got at it.

[illegible] Fisher gave a great feast, [illegible] Queen of Connaught went [illegible] were gone the daughters. [illegible] it would be great [illegible] Rocking Chair. There [illegible] Rocking Chair [illegible] great [illegible] of going into [illegible] Caillí Cooo-Coo [illegible] Princess of the Woods [illegible] a Ball, and they [illegible] away with their [illegible].

[illegible] Maeve away into the [illegible] water [illegible] the Princess [illegible] Maeve said, "Let me [illegible] the shoes, and [illegible] the blood stains were gone. [illegible] a big girl that was there, strong her and [illegible] her dripping through, and [illegible] the shirt and ran with it to the castle, [illegible] she had washed out the bloodstains.

Now a Herb-wife in Roscrea was the old woman that castles who looked after the [illegible] and who all generally supervised [illegible]. When the Prince had recovered, and who had got the stage of blood on the shirt for him, and told him that no woman would wash out those stains except his own wife. On the strength of that he had given the princess a night. But she would which [illegible] that the princess would [illegible] he could not get, so when this girl appeared and showed the spots washed out clean, the Prince took to heart so much his being compelled to marry her, that he was seized with a raging fever, and for months had to get [illegible] but he was seized with a raging fever, and for months had to get [illegible] Princess. Then this girl [illegible] that gone but her bed a couple of nurse girls and she was by his bed both day and night.

When Maeve recovered, the Herb-wife took her home, and got her to her [illegible] of Connaught. Now the King [illegible] and the richest man [illegible] Landowner, man in the [illegible] Princess of the Woods [illegible] a Ball, and they [illegible] away with their [illegible].

[illegible] Maeve away into the [illegible] water [illegible] the Princess [illegible] Maeve said, "Let me [illegible] the shoes, and [illegible] the blood stains were gone. [illegible] a big girl that was there, strong her and [illegible] her dripping through, and [illegible] the shirt and ran with it to the castle, [illegible] she had washed out the bloodstains.

Now a Herb-wife in Roscrea was the old woman that castles who looked after the [illegible] and who all generally supervised [illegible]. When the Prince had recovered, and who had got the stage of blood on the shirt for him, and told him that no woman would wash out those stains except his own wife. On the strength of that he had given the princess a night. But she would which [illegible] that the princess would [illegible] he could not get, so when this girl appeared and showed the spots washed out clean, the Prince took to heart so much his being compelled to marry her, that