The Sun.

Fair and colder to-day; occasional rain or snow to-morrow.

VOL. LXVIII.—NO. 18. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1901.—COPYRIGHT, 1901, BY THE SUN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION. PRICE TWO CENTS.

EULOGIES IN PARLIAMENT.

LORD SALISBURY AND MR. BALFOUR PAY TRIBUTES TO THE QUEEN.

Fine Message from King Edward VII. Read in Both Houses and Addresses in Reply Adopted — Ambassador Choate and Members of Embassy Present in House of Lords.

[illegible] Queen Victoria [illegible] Parliament [illegible] Lord Salisbury [illegible] Mr. Balfour [illegible] Lord Salisbury said [illegible] Mr. Balfour, after the reading of the message, rose to move an address to the King [illegible]

The history of this House is not a brief or uneventful one, but I think it never met under sadder circumstances than to-day or had a duty laid upon it more clearly of expressing a universal sorrow, which extends not only from one end of the Kingdom to the other, but from one end of the Empire to the other — a sorrow which fills every heart and which every citizen of this great Empire feels, not merely as a national but also as an irreparable personal loss. The reign of Queen Victoria is no mere chronological landmark; it is no mere convenient division of time useful for the historian or the chronicler. We feel as we do feel because we were intimately associated with the personality of Queen Victoria during the succession of the great events which filled her reign and during the development of the Empire wherever she has ruled, and in so associating her personality with these events surely we do well.

"The importance of the Constitution, in my judgment, is not a diminishing, but an increasing factor. It is increasing and must increase with all the growth and development of those free, self-governing communities — these new commonwealths beyond the seas which are bound to us by the person of the sovereign, who is the leading symbol of the unity of the Empire. [Hear! Hear!]

But, sir, it is not given to a constitutional monarch to signalize his reign by any great isolated action. The effect of a constitutional sovereign, great as it is, is produced by the slow and constant cumulative result of a great ideal and a great example. [Cheers.] As to that great ideal and example, surely Victoria is the first of all constitutional monarchs the world has yet seen." [Cheers.]

After speaking further in eulogy of the Queen Mr. Balfour continued:

"The message of the King calls forth, according to ministerial usage, a double response. We condole with his Majesty in the inconsolable loss he and his country have sustained, and congratulate him on his accession to the sovereignty of this ancient kingdom.

"I crave leave to read the following address, which I ask the House to assent:

"'To which I ask the Commons to add the respectful petition that his Majesty be requested to lay before the great sorrow which his Majesty has sustained in the death of his illustrious mother, the late Queen, whose devotion to the duties of her high station and to the welfare of the people will ever cause her to be remembered with reverence and affection.'

"We submit to his Majesty our respectful congratulations on his accession to the throne and assure his Majesty of our loyal affection to his person, and further assure him of our earnest conviction that his reign will be distinguished under the blessing of Providence by a sincere desire to maintain the laws of the Kingdom and promote the happiness of his subjects."

Mr. Henry Campbell-Bannerman, formerly Secretary of State for War, seconded the address. He confined the remarks of Mr. Balfour and added a tribute to Queen Alexandra.

The Speaker then put the address, which was carried unanimously, and the House adjourned until [illegible]

The House of Lords met at 4 o'clock. There was an almost unprecedented attendance of peers and all the available space in the galleries was filled. Ever since was assembled indeed morning. The week-long grief of the members was this proceeded with, a large number [illegible] At 4:30 o'clock Lord Salisbury announced that he had received a message from the King, the terms of which he would communicate to the House. He then read the message to the Lord Chancellor, who read it aloud. The purport of the message was similar to that read in the House of Commons. Lord Salisbury then said:

Mr. Lords, We who have had the opportunity of seeing the close working of her character in the discharge of our duty to her take this opportunity of testifying our sincere admiration which she inspired and the great force which her distinguished character exercised over all who came near her. The position of a constitutional sovereign is not in every case [illegible] Duties have to be reconciled at times with wishes seen far apart, that may have to be accepted which you not always be pleasing to accept, but she showed wonderful power of observing with the most absolute exactness the limits imposed by the Constitution and on the other hand of maintaining, as she did, an persistent influence on the action of her Ministers and on the course of legislation, an influence which none could mistake. She was able to accept some things which, perhaps, she did not entirely approve, but she never failed in her duty in her position to the people. She always meditated and practised a kindly supervision over public affairs, giving her Ministers the benefit of her advice and warning them of dangers and of dangers ahead. She corrected many of us with a profound [illegible] penetration, almost intuition, [illegible] saw the perils with which we were [illegible] She left on my mind [illegible] always dangerous to take any [illegible] great importance of the wisdom [illegible] thoroughly convinced [illegible] I may say with [illegible] being her foible [illegible] regarded her advice as pressed [illegible] always feeling [illegible] a lingering reminiscence [illegible] nursing into danger [illegible] ordinary knowledge of what [illegible] I have always thought [illegible] I knew pretty [illegible] would think [illegible] She had [illegible] never ad-

[illegible] Florida and Atlanta Fast Mail.

[illegible] Leaves for Fast Mail Atlanta, Pennsylvania [illegible] Atlanta [illegible] Pullman sleepers [illegible] New Orleans, Nashville [illegible] Florida [illegible] Fast Mail [illegible] Pullman sleepers [illegible] Florida [illegible] Fast Mail [illegible] Pullman sleepers [illegible] Atlanta [illegible] Pullman sleepers [illegible] Atlanta [illegible] Pullman sleepers [illegible] Atlanta