MISS ANN

By HAZEL V. PARIS.

(© 1921, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

On that hot August morning the sun bent down mercilessly on the little village. The occasional passing carriage stirred up clouds of dust that settled on the dried, brown and already thickly coated grass and trees. Only the whirr of the locust broke the heavy silence. Not the faintest white cloud in the blazing blue sky promised relief from the intolerable weather.

At the click of the gate and the sound of a quick step on the brick path, Miss Elizabeth Ann pushed her spectacles up from the tip of her nose and waited for her visitor to appear around the corner of the little porch, closed in with honeysuckle vines, whose heavy odor made the atmosphere more oppressive.

"Good morning, Miss Emmons," said the cheery voice of a young man, tall and fair, his well-built figure showing to splendid advantage in the service uniform of a major.

"Why, Bobbie Andrews! Bless my soul! We didn't expect your back for at least a month yet. Bless my soul! Elizabeth, Elizabeth Ann!" she called, as she turned in the doorway.

"Yes, auntie." Then as she saw the man, "Bob!" In a second she was in his arms laughing, sobbing, crying, all in the same breath.

"Bob, I can't believe it's true—back—oh! I can scarcely believe it's you."

As the two lovers, arm in arm, went down from the little porch and over to the old grape arbor, Miss Elizabeth Ann resumed her seat and her knitting behind the honeysuckle vines. For a few moments she worked quietly and steadily; then, as the tears, which stubbornly refused to be kept back, blinded her vision and dropped on her gaunt, wrinkled fingers, she laid down her needles and wept softly and tremulously.

Fifty-eight years ago a splendid, stalwart young soldier had opened the gate of the garden, stepped quickly up the path onto the porch, and greeted a silver-haired old lady who was knitting behind the honeysuckle vines. "Elizabeth, Elizabeth Ann," she had called, stepping to the door.

"Yes, auntie—coming."

It was she, Miss Elizabeth Ann, who, in her quaint hoop-skirt, with her black hair arranged smoothly in braids around her ears, had stepped out shyly to greet her lover, Bobbie Andrews' uncle. Leaving a dear old silver-haired lady sitting behind the honeysuckle vines, together they had gone down from the little porch into the garden to the grape arbor.

Then Elizabeth Ann had walked down the brick path with him, and when the gate had clicked and he started up the village street, she waited to wave her handkerchief as he turned back.

John Andrews was answering his country's call. Theirs was a parting—the final parting—he had not come back to her as had Bob to little Elizabeth Ann.

REBUKE THAT WAS DESERVED

How Andrew Jackson, Warrior President, Gave Buchanan a Fairly Gentle "Call Down."

Andrew Jackson, warrior and President, was a follower of the doctrine which exalts the value of attending to one's own business. On one occasion James Buchanan, who was a diplomat, a gentleman and a scholar, and somewhat of a ladies' man, although he lived and died unmarried, brought an English woman of high degree to call upon General Jackson, then monarch of all he surveyed in and around the White House. Leaving the lady in the reception room below and going upstairs to the President's private quarters, Senator Buchanan (for he was the newly elected senator from Pennsylvania at that time) found Jackson unshorn and unkempt in dressing gown and slippers before a blazing log fire, smoking his cob pipe.

When he was told about the beautiful English woman, he replied that he would be delighted to meet her, and ordered Senator Buchanan to go back and tell her that the President would be down immediately. Senator Buchanan was terribly afraid that General Jackson would not change his clothes before he made his appearance in the drawing room and he ventured to suggest to him the propriety of his doing so.

"Buchanan," said the old warrior, rising and deliberately, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, "I will tell you something that will do you good, as it doth the upright in heart, and that is, that I once knew a man down in Tennessee who made a fortune by attending to his own business."

"Canadian Soldiers Well Treated."
That the Canadian pension scheme involves the payment of $35,000,000 yearly to the 90,000,000 pensioners was the declaration of Col. John Thompson, chairman of the board of army pension commissioners, during his visit at Edmonton, Alberta, in connection with his annual inspection tour. Under the recent amendments to the act, the pensions to Canadian soldiers are said to be the most generous paid by any allied government.

But They Are Forgotten.
Jnd Tunkius says there have been enough fine commencement speeches to keep the world running right forever if people would only pay attention to 'em.
