SEAHORSES HERE.

A Score of These Little Creatures at the Aquarium.

Twenty seahorses captured off Atlantic City have lately been installed at the Aquarium, the largest of the bunch being nearly five inches in length. Some visitors still expect to find the seahorses as big as land horses and they are surprised when they discover how small they are—the biggest seahorses grow to be only about ten inches in length—but they are sure to feel admiration for the gentle little creatures.

In this lot there are seahorses of various colors. There are brown seahorses that suggest bay horses, and there are horses nearly white and yellow horses and gray horses.

Rising from the bottom of their tank is a little clump of a species of coral with upright stems like the slender denuded stalks of a plant. The seahorses like to curl the tips of their tails around these slender stalks, there to remain with their heads upright in the water.

Sometimes a seahorse will shift from one stalk to another as a bird might from one twig to another, and some of the seahorses may be found at the bottom of the tank delving in masses of mosslike aquatic vegetation placed there for the seahorses' benefit, in which they find gammarus, a tiny little crustacean on which they feed.

Or the seahorses may be seen swimming in the water, their filmy little dorsal fins waving gently and their delicate little pectoral fins flying so fast that their movements cannot be followed at all with the eye. The seahorse, swimming commonly in an upright position, moves through the water without commotion, very smoothly, with a gentleness that amounts almost to dignity.
