FEEDING THE BRITISH FIRING LINE

"Bully beef" distributed from motor lorries during a hot action. As they fell back before the German advance in the early retreat upon Paris, the British soldiers were well cared for by the Army Service Corps, whose motor lorry drivers had a herculean task in reaching the constantly shifting lines. Great pluck was displayed by the men whose duty it was to run to and fro along the trenches amid the bursting German shrapnel and toss tins of beef and bread to the lying down infantry.
