them narrated the facts concerning her leaving the orphan asylum in Prince street, and going to live with O'Brien, and detailed the circumstances connected with the commission of the offence charged.

The witness was cross-examined.

Catherine Cass, sister of the prosecutrix, was examined and cross-examined at great length.

The prisoner denied the charge, and produced witnesses to prove the impossibility of her having screamed upon the morning in question as she alleged, or she she would have been heard and also as to her general character and want of credibility on oath.

At the conclusion, the Justice said he should consult his minutes of the testimony, before deciding whether the prisoner should be held for rape or not. He would, therefore, deliver his decision upon Monday (this day) at ten o'clock in the morning; and as he had not jurisdiction to take bail in this case, the defendant should be remanded in the meantime. O'Brien was removed accordingly, to the cells.
