The Saint and the Sinner a tale not stranger than true.—"Here is a thin volume of sharp, often ringing and always vociferous rhyme. Whoever wrote it did not want for language, even to its finest shades and subtleties. Versification was evidently not his art, but his nature; and, if by reading and observation he had learned to distinguish a "Saint," we doubt not his knowledge of the "Sinner" was perfectly experimental and personal. The writer is a worshipper of Venus in the spirit of an Antinous and the book should be shunned by all who are not fortified by a deep love for the pure and truly beautiful. 'Sinner' heroine is selected from some lofty vocation, and is one who has fallen utterly from woman's "high estate." She allures a "Saint" (a misnomer, by the way) to her abode who proves to be one who had wronged her; whereupon he is compelled to listen to the full story of her innocence, her shame, and her woes, told in a fiery strain. The tale is somewhat suggestive, but the passionate tale is highly illustrated as it is by personal portraiture."—N. Y. Evening Mirror. "It lashes the vices of the great city so unsparingly as the satirist Juvenal whipped with his kindling verse the besmutched morals of lascivious Rome."—Daily Times. "Its versification is full of the graceful wantonness of Rochester."—Daily Express. "This is emphatically the most sterling production of the day."—Robin Hood. "Hot Corn," unheeded, and the 'Old Brewery' resate its claws on for 'The Saint and the Sinner' eclipses them altogether."—National Democrat. "The imagery is exquisite, and the poetry throughout is beautiful."—Morning Star. "We read it at one sitting, and did not sleep all night for it."—N. Y. Sunday Atlas. "Since the days of Lord Byron, nothing so grand in a poetical sense has been offered to the public."—Sunday Courier. Sold by Burtzer & Townsend, 222 Broadway; Dewitt & Davenport, Tribune Buildings; Long & Brother 121 Nassau street; Dexter & Brother 14 and 16 Ann street; and by the principal news agents and booksellers.
