on the following morning is expanded into a torrent that the stoutest man would hesitate to breast. Before night it may fall again and become a slender rivulet. The day before the Castor had been high, but in a single twenty-four hours it had fallen sufficiently to allow Marmaduke to cross with everything except a few stragglers.

The enemy were in small force on the opposite bank of the Castor, and a skirmish of a half hour ensued. It is probable that this was merely their rear guard, halted for the purpose of checking our advance and giving the head of their column time to move away, as they did not keep up the contest with vigor, but retired soon after we brought our artillery to bear upon them. Our loss in the skirmish was four wounded, one supposed to be mortally. The rebels lost several wounded by shrapnel from Atwater's battery, and after retiring their commander sent in a flag of truce asking permission to remove his wounded. This request was granted.

The rebel prisoners whom we have taken express much chagrin at the result of their campaign into Southeast Missouri. They acknowledge themselves badly defeated at Cape Girardeau by General McNeil, and again at Jackson by General Vandever. The attack at night they were hardly prepared for, and, at all events, a cavalry charge by moonlight must have been a new thing to them. There are indications that they are becoming about as fearful of the naval as they have heretofore been of our gunboats. From all that we can learn they are much disheartened at the disastrous termination of their campaign. They are stripping the inhabitants of everything, without the slightest regard to their sympathies. Even the most ardent secessionists manifest a strong dislike for the army which was to relieve them of Yankee tyranny.

The rebels are expecting reinforcements at Poplar Bluff, on the Current River. Some of them assert that Price is coming up, but there appears no actual proof to that effect. We shall push forward and press them as rapidly as possible, in the hope of either bringing them to a stand or compelling them to abandon their artillery and transportation.

I give below the names of those of our men captured by the rebels in the skirmish at Whitewater on the 27th:—

Capt. H. A. Spencer, Co. E, 3d Iowa cavalry.
First Sergeant Thomas H. Brenton, Co. E, 3d Iowa cavalry.
Sergeant Geo. C. Hazlewood, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
Sergeant Newton Batton, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
Michael Zimmer, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
W. F. Cravan, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
George Weiney, Co. F, 3d Iowa.
J. N. Phelps, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
Wm. Miller, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
Ambrose Culbertson, Co. E, 3d Iowa.
Sergeant Norman, Co. E, 3d Iowa, wounded, captured and released near Castor.
Bugler Clinton Soon, Co. H, 3d Iowa.
— Butterfield, Co. H, 3d Iowa.
— Vansickle, Co. H, 3d Iowa.
— Vansickle, Co. H, 3d Iowa,

And two others of the same regiment—one corporal and one private—whose names I could not obtain.

The enemy obtained a few carbines and revolvers, and about a dozen sabres.

It is possible that the rebels may scatter their forces at Bloomfield, as there are several roads leading from that point. By so doing they can greatly facilitate their escape.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF MR. L. A. HENDRICKS.

FIFTH ARMY CORPS HEADQUARTERS, IN THE WOODS, BACK OF CHANCELLORSVILLE, VA., May 3, 1863.

We have had some of the heaviest fighting of the war since sending my despatch yesterday afternoon. Happily the Fifth corps has been blessed with the good fortune of being only slight sufferers.

GENERAL HUMPHREY'S DIVISION.

General Humphrey's division, is a painful exception however, as will be seen by the account below, in the terribly sanguinary conflicts of the past twenty-four hours. What may be yet in store for us—through what new scenes and changes we must pass, and how we may come out of the series of contests so fiercely begun and prosecuted, and with no show of speedy termination—involved in deepest darkness and doubt.

GENERAL SUMMARY.

Hardly had the messenger left with my last despatch when a general skirmishing began nearly the whole length of our line. It was kept up rather desultorily—cannonading and musketry intermingling until about five o'clock, when it waxed into a fight.

GENERAL ENGAGEMENT.

The attack was mainly on the right, where the work was warmest. For one or two hours the roar of artillery and musketry was incessant. The disastrous and disgraceful flying way of General Sykes's division of Gen. Howard's corps (Slocum's old corps) completely changed the fortunes of the day. The men, I am told, fled like so many sheep before a pack of wolves, and the enemy rushed up, taking possession of the abandoned line along the Confederate state road and compelled the construction of a new line.

SHELLING OF THE CHANCELLOR MANSION.

Owing to the falling back of Sykes's men the enemy came to waiting to bring their pieces to bear on the Chancellor mansion, which they shelled and burned, and that notwithstanding it was filled with our wounded and had a hospital flag flying in front. Our wounded, who could not be removed, met death from the shells or the flames. Some of their own wounded, who were being properly cared for there, met the same terrible fate. The scene here—the fleeing of the female inmates and abandonment of the place by Gen. Hooker as his headquarters—will be graphically described by your headquarters correspondent, who remained and witnessed the entire scene, which I did not.

THE RESULTS OF THIS AFTERNOON'S BATTLE

cannot be fully told for some time. Many of our killed and wounded (I refer to those of other corps) had to be left on the field, and many a brave one, through neglect of his wounds, must have died since.

A MIDNIGHT ATTACK.

About eleven o'clock last night, as the moon was obscured by a passing cloud, the enemy renewed his attack of the afternoon. The attack was most desperate. Our men stood firm and fought like tigers, and refused to yield an inch of ground. The enemy thought to follow up the advantage gained in the afternoon, but through change in the position of our line and our brave resistance their attempts to advance were as frequently repulsed. When the enemy made the attack they came with terrific yells followed by instantaneous volleys of musketry and incessant artillery. Our men were not taken as much by surprise as was expected. They rose with responsive yells, and responsive musketry and artillery added to the roar of the enemy's fire. The fight lasted two hours. It was part of Malvern Hill over again—moonlight and mournful massacre of men. The Fifth corps lost but very few, the force of the attack being directed on other parts of the line.

FIGHTING THE MORNING.

The enemy made a third attack this morning at six o'clock. It was in this attack that General Tyler's brigade, of General Humphrey's division, met with their severe loss. Besides the One Hundred and Thirty third and One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania regiments, Colonel Alabaster's brigade and the Sixth United States infantry, of General Sykes' division, those were the only troops of the Fifth corps sustaining loss. The men fought splendidly. No troops ever fought better. A determination to hold the position caused General Tyler to sustain the loss he did. His men made four separate charges upon the enemy and drove them back each time. Our men had the best of the fight in the end.

STILL ANOTHER ATTACK.

About half-past five P. M. another attack was made upon our troops. A change in our tactics meantime had been made, which the enemy were not long in finding out to their sorrow. The attack was in the centre, where the Chancellorsville mansion stood. They massed in the field beyond the house. Our men lay in trenches, which they had dug in the interim, and not seeing any men the enemy advanced right in front of several of our batteries concealed in the woods. At the word our batteries opened on them. Col. Gurney, of the Ninth Massachusetts, who was looking at the enemy at the time through a field glass, says the effect of our firing was terrible. It was like throwing off powder in a basin filled with flies. He saw one officer on a white horse blown high into the air. In a moment the dead lay in heaps. Our batteries had an enfilading fire on them. The enemy, those who escaped, flew wildly before our murderous rain of shot and shell. Even Gen. Griffin's division, which occupied the trenches fronting this attack, in support of the batteries, met with very little loss. I give below a list of our killed and wounded in the above attack, as far as I have been able to procure the names. In the present state of activity and confusion, and occupying the trenches as the corps does at this time, it is impossible to get the full and accurate details. As stated above, our loss thus far has been only slight.

GENERAL TYLER'S LOSS.

In addition to the loss sustained by Gen. Sykes's division day before yesterday, Lieutenant Colonel Locke, of General Meade's staff, informs me that General Tyler reports that he went into the fight before he met with such severe loss with 1,800 men, and had only 600 men left at the end of the action. Notwithstanding this report, the general impression is that more than half the missing here will make their reappearance.

KILLED AND WOUNDED.

Captain Grant, Co. B, 134th Pennsylvania, killed.
Colonel Gregory, 91st Pennsylvania, foot.
Lieutenant Colonel Wm. W. Shaw, 134th Pennsylvania, leg.

John Flemming, Co. C, 9th Massachusetts.
James Goshan, Co. E, 9th Massachusetts.

I have been obliged to be brief to get my despatch in readiness for the messenger, who has waited while I have written it. Our officers and men still feel confident, and are made more so by the news reaching us of the taking of Fredricksburg and holding of the crests beyond by our troops on the enemy's left.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF MR. S. M. CARPENTER.

CHANCELLORSVILLE, May 3, 1863.

A REVIEW OF TWO DAYS' OPERATIONS.

Day before yesterday, about eleven o'clock, the Fifth corps advanced from Chancellorsville down the old turnpike towards Fredericksburg. Six miles from the city the enemy had intrenched himself, and showed an inclination to dispute our further progress. The artillery opened in a few moments and a severe fight was maintained for some time, General Sykes' division of regulars being hotly engaged. Our advance was gradually driven back to Chancellorsville, where Hampton's Pennsylvania battery of ten-pounder Parrott guns was planted, supported by the Seventh Maine and Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania regiments. Skirmishing was kept up through out the afternoon, but results were insignificant. Yesterday morning the attack began simultaneously on the right and on the left below Fredericksburg.

The rebels advanced against our front, cheering and fighting like demons, but were repulsed. After a lull of considerable time, during which their troops could be seen moving hastily around further to the right, an attack was made by the enemy on the plank road. Geary's division fought handsomely, and after a fierce struggle drove them back. Towards night a demonstration was made on our right flank from the direction of Gordonsville. The cannonading was very heavy, and the roar of musketry deafening. The Eleventh corps fell into disorder, and came back upon the main body of the troops badly broken up, but the Twelfth corps moved rapidly out and checked the enemy's operations.

OUR POSITION ON SATURDAY NIGHT.

At night our front extended along the plank road, with our right resting near Wilderness and our left at Chancellorsville. During the night there was some skirmishing and a few volleys of musketry, but nothing of importance was accomplished by either side.

THE ENGAGEMENT ON SUNDAY.

This morning the battle commenced in earnest. The enemy pushed up against our lines steadily and with a persistence almost incredible, but our batteries, supported by the Third corps, mowed them down by hundreds, and finally compelled them to retire. Their batteries, however, soon opened again. The large brick mansion at Chancellorsville, used as headquarters by General Hooker, was shelled and set on fire. Previous to leaving the building General Hooker was knocked down by a post supporting the porch, which a shell had torn out, and for a short time the command devolved upon General Couch. General Hooker's bruises were not serious.

OUR LINES FALLING BACK.

Our lines gradually fell back towards the river about a mile, where another stand was made behind intrenchments, which position we now hold. About eleven o'clock to-day the firing ceased, and was not resumed again until late this afternoon.

CAPTURE OF GUNS AND COLORS.

A number of guns and several stands of colors have been captured from the enemy, together with nearly two hundred prisoners. Several of our pieces have been lost. One battery was taken by the enemy, but recaptured by our own men.

It is impossible to form any idea of our loss. The troops are in most excellent spirits, and can scarcely be restrained. We have not suffered heavily, however, and will doubtless be able to ascertain the entire loss to morrow.

General Berry was killed, shot through the shoulder and chest, it is believed by a rebel sharpshooter. General Levins and General Mott were wounded. General Hancock had a horse shot under him.

Fighting is now—six P. M.—going on quite briskly. It is reported that our infantry hold Gordonsville, and that our forces have occupied Hanover Court House.

The intelligence that the Sixth corps had crossed at Fredricksburg created among the troops the wildest enthusiasm. It is believed that the enemy is rapidly retreating; but since the engagement of this morning very little has been ascertained concerning his movements. From prisoners we have taken it is learned that the enemy has had his entire force engaged to-day, with the exception of Early's division, which was left at Fredericksburg.

The battle will probably be continued to-morrow.
