The Schooner Belle Destined for a Rebel Port—How the Transfer of Command was Managed—The Manner in which Sailing Vessels Break the Blockade—List of Lucky and Unlucky "Runners"—The Anglo-Rebel Merchants, Their Business Connections and Fortunes, &c.

THE SCHOONER BELLE.

My suspicions concerning the schooner Belle have been substantially realized. She is intended to run the blockade. Though not sold, she has been handed over for a term to Captain Kennedy and Mr. Keane, two of my fellow passengers from Havana. The captain is the gentleman of whom I spoke in my last as holding a commission in the rebel service. With them are undoubtedly associated a Mr. Ainslie, who is an Englishman, and another young gentleman, whose name I have not retained in my memory—both also passengers by the Belle; and they are all anticipating a prosperous trip to Dixie. My reasons for arriving at this conclusion are as follows:—

The other evening while seated under the piazza of the Victoria Hotel, enjoying the cool air, Captain Watson, commanding the Belle, came up in great tribulation and evidently much excited. He was accompanied by the captain of a British vessel in port, whose acquaintance he had recently made. In answer to the usual "What's the news, Captain?"

Captain Watson replied, half out of breath, "No news, sir, but what concerns myself, and that is of so serious and singular a character that I can hardly make it out."

"What is it all about?" was my rejoinder. Upon this Captain Watson informed me that on the previous evening, while at supper with the other captain, on board the Belle, Captain Gordon, one of the passengers who came with us, came on board. This gentleman had established himself on board the Belle by the express invitation of Captain Watson himself, on the score of Gordon being a seafaring man, and the consequent willingness of his host to save him the expense of a heavy hotel bill. While at supper Captain Watson overheard a Spanish sailor apply to him a most opprobrious epithet in his own language, in reference to the captain's having caused the steward to be sent to prison for a month for getting drunk and neglecting his duty. Captain Watson went forward to remonstrate, in seafaring fashion, with the man, upon which Gordon accompanied him, declaring that he would have no more trouble on board the vessel, adding that he was captain of the vessel; that he had been sent on here to Nassau to take charge of her on her arrival here, and that next day the two gentlemen to whom she had been handed over would be on board, and show the captain the necessary document establishing the authority of him (Captain Gordon).

Watson was, of course, taken somewhat aback at this cool statement, made in such an abrupt manner; for, said he to me, the owners of the Belle took me out of another schooner in their employ, and, unsolicited by me, put me in command of the Belle. Further, on the morning when we left, Mr. ——, one of the owners, came on board and said he left the vessel unreservedly in my hands, adding, "You may go to hell with her, if you wish." Besides, if he (Watson) was to give up charge to Gordon, why, send the latter on board the same vessel as passenger to Nassau? Why give Watson charge of her at all? At all events one thing was clear Gordon could show no authority on the spot, and was only on board as the guest of Captain Watson. He did not long remain on board on such terms, for Captain Watson ordered him on shore, bag and baggage, then and there—an order that was duly complied with. Next morning the two gentlemen to whom the schooner had been turned over went on board, accompanied by Captain Gordon, when they showed him a letter from the owners, stating that she had been so handed over. The gentlemen at the same time informed Captain Watson that they had really given the command to Captain Gordon. Watson, however, would not yield his command on such questionable authority. Nothing less than a letter from the owners to himself would satisfy him on this score; nor has he receded from his position yet, and there the matter rests.

In justice to Captain Watson I can say that he proved himself quite competent to retain charge of the vessel. He was always attentive to his duties, and took very little rest at nights, his attention being directed to his charts and the course of the vessel. In fact, unfitness has not been alleged against him. His removal is mentioned as a foregone conclusion before he sailed to this place. Captain Watson, on his part, objects to Captain Gordon taking command of the Belle—a British registered vessel, engaged in foreign trade, on the ground that the latter has no certificate of having passed his examination as a master.

Since these events I have frequently seen Mr. Keane, the rebel captain, Mr. Ainslie, and my other young fellow passenger, in close private confab together, and, last night Ainslie remarked to me that he would leave Nassau in a week's time. "Where to?" I asked, knowing that there would be no chance to the Northern States nor to Europe within that time, to which he replied, "To Dixie." Putting this and that together, the meaning is that the Belle is to attempt to run the blockade of some Southern port in somewhat less than two weeks on one of those forthcoming fine, dark nights, and that Messrs. Keane, Ainslie & Co., are to be on board.

HOW SAILING VESSELS RUN INTO REBEL PORTS.

It may puzzle most persons to know how the blockade is so frequently run, even by sailing vessels, with so many steamers on the watch at the entrances of the blockaded ports. The thing is simple enough, and is done principally by a good share of what Dundon called "audacity, and nerve and audacity." A moonless night is waited for; if the stars are obscured by clouds, so much the better, if the night is stormy, better yet. The vessel intended to run the blockade is painted lead color, so that in the dark she cannot be distinguished from the water at a distance. Thus prepared, she boldly heads towards the blockading squadron, the vessels comprising which are rather more likely not to have steam up as to have it. Perhaps the watch is sleepy, and the blockade runner is not discovered till she is close by, when her audacity causes her to be taken for a transport or some other vessel connected with the squadron. Perhaps some vague suspicion seizes on the watch and the alarm is given. All hands are called to quarters; but what then? Two or three guns are fired wide of their mark, and the blockade breaker is out of harm's way before her range can be got, the persons on board laughing heartily at the manner in which they have "done the damned Yankees." In this manner large steamers have been known to successfully run the blockade and to arrive here with cargoes of cotton. Witness the steamer from Charleston itself on the very eve of an attack on the fortifications at that place, as I mentioned in my former letter.

THE BLOCKADE ARRANGEMENTS.

In conversation with a Union gentleman a day or two ago he expressed his opinion that the blockade was all wrong; that it was instituted at the wrong place. He was of opinion that Nassau was the proper port to blockade—of course keeping the legal distance of one league from shore. As Nassau is the depot of articles contraband of war from Europe to the South, and of cotton from the South to Europe, he argued that a strict blockade at a short distance from this port would either result in the capture of the blockade runners or break up the contraband traffic altogether. But, he proceeded, the process would be an expensive one, and would necessitate as strict a surveillance over the Bermudas as over New Providence; for, unless this were done, the persons engaged in the illicit trade could remove their sphere of operations from here to Bermuda in a couple of weeks. But, to my mind, there is another objection to a blockade of any port in these seas or of the Bermudas. That is, such an act would be regarded by Great Britain as a casus belli on the part of the United States. Besides, if you remove the blockade from the Southern ports, or reduce it to a mere paper blockade, neutrals would be enabled to run in and out of those ports with impunity, taking any sort of cargo out and carrying anything in not contraband of war.

LIST OF LUCKY RUNNERS.

So much for disquisition. Now for a few facts which I have been able to glean during my sojourn here. The magnitude of the operations in the way of blockade running may be faintly estimated by the following statement, embracing a period of two months. The undermentioned steamers have been known to successfully run the blockade and to arrive here with cargoes of cotton. Witness the steamer from Charleston itself on the very eve of an attack on the fortifications at that place, as I mentioned in my former letter.
