SPECIAL NOTICES.

A.—OYSTER CONTROVERSY BETWEEN TWO States.—It will be remembered that in the Fall of 1868 a large bed of seed oysters was discovered near the mouth of Bridgeport, Conn., harbor. The greater part of this bed would fall within a line drawn from headland to headland of the Connecticut coast, and until recently it has always been admitted to pertain to and form a portion of that State. Some pretensions to the contrary having lately been advanced, a convention of Connecticut oystermen met at Bridgeport February 7 and 22, 1873, and, after forming a permanent State association and appointing a committee to memorialize the Legislature, passed resolutions pledging its members to use every exertion to bring to justice all non-residents attempting to take any oysters, clams or shell fish within the waters of the State of Connecticut. A committee of seventeen was also appointed to prosecute all trespassers.

All persons interested are respectfully requested to take notice that the question of boundary between Connecticut on the north and New York State on the south is well settled; and their attention is called to a decision, rendered in May, 1871, by Judge Shipman, of the United States District Court, in the case of Keyser vs. Coe.

The rules in controversies touching the boundaries of States do not differ materially from those relating to the boundaries of land between individuals. In both cases resort must be had to documents of title, such as grants, charters and deeds, and in the second place to evidence of use and occupation. All the great documents of title—viz., the Warwick patent of 1631, the famous Charter of Connecticut, granted by Charles II. in 1662, and the patent to the Duke of York in 1664, concur in bounding Connecticut on the south by the sea—that is, by the Atlantic Ocean; and until 1635 Connecticut in fact did exercise jurisdiction over that part of Long Island abreast of her shores. The islands on the north shore of the Sound have also uniformly been held and occupied by citizens of Connecticut down to the present time. The decision of Judge Shipman is, therefore, that a straight line drawn from the extremity of Point Judith, extending westward forty leagues to Lyon's Point, at the mouth of Byram River, is the true boundary line between the States. Such a line would pass several miles south of the oyster bed at present in dispute, and would consequently leave it entirely within the jurisdiction of Connecticut.
