CITY & NEWS ITEMS

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 3, 1858

☞ For City News see first page.
For Market Reports and Marine News, see fourth page.

IMPROVEMENTS, NEW MARKET HOUSE.—Messrs. Stickney & Baker yesterday opened their new meat market on the corner of Ontario and Michigan streets. This new block they have recently erected and have fitted up a large sales room in the most convenient and elegant manner of any market rooms in the city. The main room is forty feet in depth by twenty-five feet front. In the rear of this is a store room separated from the sales room by a lattice work, which most is cut and prepared for sale. The sales room is provided with any quantity of meat hooks which are fastened upon an iron frame work depending from the ceiling, which is a great ornament to the room as well as a supporter for tempting rows of fine looking meat. Marble topped counters extend around the sides of the room and through the centre, while the space under the side counters is filled up with small cupboards for stowing away any small article. Beautiful gas burners are arranged so as to throw the light brilliantly into all parts of the room by night while three large plate glass show windows render the room light and cheerful by day. In the rear of this room, and by the side of the store room, is a Preservatory which adjoins an extensive ice house, and by slides at the floor and ceiling the cold air comes in from the ice at the floor, and the warm air passes back at the ceiling, thus keeping up a constant circulation through the room where the meat is kept during the warm weather. Under the whole a cellar extends, which will be used for the manufacture of sausages, &c. These gentlemen well understand that a neat and pleasant sales room will attract customers, and are determined not to be outdone in this respect. Buyers will find good meat, and courteous treatment at the establishment of Messrs. Stickney & Baker, and we predict for them success in their new house.

NEW LARD OIL FACTORY.—Messrs. Outhwaite & Blackwell are putting up a new building on St. Clair street, above Water, to be used in place of their present Lard Oil Factory. The building is forty-one feet by sixty, three stories in hight, and built in a substantial manner. The whole of the building is to be used for the above purpose.

QUEER CUSTOMER.—An old man calling himself Sackett, called at the station house last night for lodging, as he was destitute of house and home. He came, as he said, from the eastern part of New York, and was on his way to Chicago, having come thus far on foot. When he gets to Chicago he proposes striking out into the prairies toward Utah, but on being asked if he was a Mormon, indignantly replied, "no, God forbid." So far from having several wives, he eschews all women, having been "disappointed" a few years ago. He is a "strictly temperance man," drinking nothing only the best Holland Gin or strongest Brandy. Sackett's Harbor was, he says, named for him; and he has flourished, if we may believe his stories, in all the wars from the Revolution to the present time. He is a "character," and will get to Chicago yet if he lives.

MELODEON.—It may be said by those who have not seen the Minstrels that we give them too much indirect minutes of puffing," but those who have seen them will not so judge us. To the first class our advice is, go and see them and you will change your opinion. To-night Johnny Pell and the Morris Bros. take a benefit, and as an instance of their desire to please and gratify our citizens, we may say that a copy of that most exquisite song, "Listen to the Mocking Bird" will be presented to every one visiting the Hall. To hear Billy Morris perform it is alone worth the admission fee. Only two more nights.

ODD FELLOWS.—A general Convention of the order of the colored men's Odd Fellow organization has been held for several days in this city. The meetings have been private, but to day a parade is to take place and an address given. The procession will start from the Hall, south side Public Square, at nine o'clock, and after marching through the principal streets, will pass to Cimpins Hall where an address will be given, it is expected, by the acting Grand Master of America, D. B. Bowser. Admission to the Hall ten cents. The proceedings of the day will close with a Ball at Ballou's Hall. We presume the affair will be well worthy of attention and notice.

☞ The Buffalonians have made arrangements to reach Put-in-Bay on the 10th of September by the steamer Forest Queen. Leaving Buffalo about 3 o'clock P. M. on Thursday the 9th, touching at Erie at 9 P. M., Cleveland at 5 A. M. Friday, and arriving at Put-in-Bay Island at about 10 A. M., in good time to participate in the festivities. Returning, leaves the Island in the evening, Cleveland at 10 P. M., Erie at 4 A. M., returning to Buffalo at 11 A. M. of Saturday, 11th September.

☞ THE WOOD SHED belonging to the C. & P. Railroad at Girard, was burned night before last with several hundred cords of wood. It probably caught from a passing engine. An engine run off the track in passing the burning building.

A Card.

ON BOARD N. T. CO. PROP. OGDENSBURGH, Lake Michigan, Aug. 28th, 1858.

At a meeting of the passengers on board the Propeller Ogdensburgh, Dr. J. B. Thorp of Cleveland was called to the Chair, and W. S. Piper appointed Secretary. The following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That in the boats of the Northern Transportation Company we recognize speed, safety, and comfort, and the Propeller Ogdensburgh in particular we recommend to the traveling public as being one of the safest, fastest and most commodious boat on the Lakes, having two separate and well appointed cabins for Ladies and Gentlemen.

Resolved, That in Captain Robert Richardson we find a true gentleman, a humane and generous commander, and a man well qualified for the post he occupies.

Resolved, That as fellow passengers we congratulate each other upon one "general good time" since coming together, and that we unite in tendering our thanks to the officers of the boat for their untiring efforts in promoting our comfort and happiness.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be furnished to the Chicago Democrat, Detroit Tribune, Cleveland Morning Leader, and Oswego Times for publication.

J. B. THORP, Chairman.
W. S. PIPER, Secretary.

MORNING LEADER.

THE CHILD'S LESSON.

IT was a stormy evening, and the snow was falling thick and fast, while the wind howled mournfully among the streets and alleys of the great metropolis, with a melancholy, wailing sound like the voice of a homeless ghost. The few foot passengers hurried along, shawled and muffled to the very ears; beggars crouched shivering in doorways and under sheds, and as the dawning twilight gradually descended, the whole scene wore an aspect of black and intense gloom. Even the wealthy Merchant, as he stood in the door of his magnificent establishment in Broadway, shuddered, involuntarily, as he wrapped his fur-lined mantle closer about his brow, preparatory to facing the wintry storm, on his homeward way.

Just as he was about to step from the warm and luxurious atmosphere of the store into the biting air without, his agent came hurrying in with a bundle of papers under his arm, and wearing a business like demeanor which at once attracted the attention of his employer.

"Well!" interrogated the merchant, shortly, for he was impatient to be at home.

"I am late, sir, I know," said the agent, "but I was unavoidably detained. That poor widow man down on Madden street, cannot pay this quarter's rent, again. Last quarter she was deficient also, and I see plainly that you can expect nothing of her."

"Well," said the merchant, coldly, as he drew on his gloves, "what is the use of troubling me with this affair! I suppose you know what to do about it!"

"I know, sir," responded the agent, who, although what is generally termed a hard business man, was not without a gleam of latent kindness in his heart, "but her situation is really very bad. Husband dead—children ailing, health miserable—she says she has worked her fingers to the very bone, to raise the rent, and I believe it to be so, from all I have seen—"

"I don't know that I'm to be held responsible for everybody else's misfortunes," interrupted the merchant still more sharply. "Why did she take a house if she could not pay for it? I can make no exception to my ordinary rules."

"But, sir," said the agent, "to turn any one out such weather as this—so sickly, too, as they seem—"

"If I once begin, there will be no end to this sort of a thing," said the merchant, pushing past the speaker; "general rules must bear hard on particular cases. I can't afford to lose my rent in this manner. Let every one take care of himself, say I."

He nodded hurriedly as he spoke, and passed out into the open air. It was no slight task to breast the angry storm as the merchant pressed along, holding his luxurious wrapper closely to his chest, he could not banish one or two slight twinges of conscience, respecting his late interview with the agent. However, he contrived to check that small, small voice of the internal monitor, by the business maxims which may do well to stifle the reproachful thrill that sometimes haunts the hardest heart, but which will shrink into nothingness when pleaded before the awful bar of God.

"Please, sir, a penny!" moaned a voice, as he struggled onward, and a gaunt hand was laid on his arm. "I never begged before, sir, and it's little I ask now of your abundance!"

The merchant looked down with an angry frown, as he met the appealing gaze of two dark hollow eyes. It was a mere boy, slender and pale, as he saw by the dim flickering light of the gas lamp close by.

"Not a farthing!" he cried sternly. "Beggars everywhere! Can't you leave me a minute's peace!"

He hastened onward with impatient speed, while the boy sank back on the door-step with a low, half audible sob, bursting from the depths of a breaking heart.

The sound caught the rich man's ear. He looked around half irresolutely, but in an instant went on, exclaiming "a worthless impostor, no doubt—let public authorities take care of him. It's none of my business!"

And yet, little as the reader might suspect, this man could be both kind hearted and generous. In the family circle, in the church, or among his friends, he scattered money and kind words with a liberal profusion; but in all the little charities of daily, work-day life, his heart was closed to the mute appeal of want—closed by long habit and by the false laws maxims that surround so many in their intercourse with the world.

One or two more blocks were soon passed, and he stood in the entrance of his own magnificent home. The soft light streaming through colored glass above the door—the carved marble pillars that supported lofty arches—the rose-wood paneling and mosaic pavement, all bespoke luxury in the highest degree. And when the door was opened, what a scene of Eastern splendor broke upon the view!

Gleaming statues, leaning from their sculptured pedestals, along the stately entrance saloon—hot-house flowers throwing their perfume on the warm and fragrant air—glittering chandeliers, and sofas and couches of velvet and satin—everything that the magician gold could conjure up, was there.

Hardly had the merchant entered, when a slight fluid figure came bounding down the flight of marble stairs at the further end of the hall to meet him. A fair, slender thing, she was scarcely eight years old, with long curls like coils of gold, and deep, serene eyes, and as she ran joyously into his arms, he held her to his heart, with a tender, loving clasp, which showed how dear she was to him.

She was the orphaned only child of his only sister—the sole heiress to all his princely wealth, and the one being upon earth whom he worshipped more than his gold—the little frail bark which contained all the treasures of his heart's deepest love.

She led him up stairs to the drawing-room—an apartment even more royally splendid than the spacious hall below. The stately windows were draped in silken folds, whose graceful waves swept the floor. Deep, richly tinted pictures, brought from foreign lands, hung on the walls—rare birds in gilded cages swung from silver chains fastened to the frescoed ceiling—Oriental vases threw back the gleam of Oriental grates from their polished surfaces, and vast mirrors multiplied every object in endless succession wherever you might turn. In truth, the room seemed more like an enchanter's palace than the abode of mortal man.

The merchant sat down before the cheerful fire, with the little one at his feet, and listened with a loving smile to all her innocent, childish prattle, for every childish accent was precious to him, and he held her tiny hand tight in his own, as if he were fearful that some fell disease should snatch that baby bloom from her infant cheek, even while she was surrounded by every safeguard that wealth and power could give.

So timesome and apprehensive is love.

"Uncle, what have you been doing to-day!" asked the child, at length, after a slight pause.

"Why, little one, you cool not understand all these business affairs—your curly head must be filled with pleasanter matters! I have been piling up money for you, Amy—loading off ships for the East—and planning about a thousand different schemes."

The little girl sat looking thoughtfully into the fire for a moment or two.

"But I mean, Uncle," she resumed in an instant, with a wishful gaze, "have you been doing any thing that will make you feel happy when you lie awake at night, listening to the wind?"

The merchant looked at her, half surprised, while an uneasy—almost guilty feeling startled him, as if some rash hand had drawn aside the curtain of his most secret soul. Her simple words seemed to awake the most buried memories of his heart, and an old sentence crept into his brain that he had not thought of for a long, long time, and almost unconsciously he murmured aloud those solemn and sublime words, "he giveth songs in the night."

"I remember that, uncle," cried the little one, her grave face breaking into a quick and sunshiny smile. "Miss Warren makes me learn a verse every day from the Bible, and I learned that not long ago."

"Indeed, that's a good plan, my little rosebud," said the merchant, not sorry for a reasonable excuse to turn the conversation, for sundry intrusive misgivings were rankling in his mind. "What have you learned to day, Amy?"

Little Amy crossed her hands on her breast,—a childish habit, but most beautiful and innocent—and looked upward with a reverent air, while she softly repeated the sentence:

"Freely ye have received, freely give."

The merchant started from his chair, as if struck by a thunderbolt. He stood irresolute for a moment, and then began to pace the floor, with a hurried, uneven step, appearing unaware of little Amy's eager questions and astonished looks.

How plainly they rose before him—the meek, pale face of the poor widow, whose home he had that day taken from her—the hollow eyes of the beggar at the roadside—ten thousand other haunting shadows peopling every corner of that regal apartment—while, like a trumpet, sounded to his ears the prophetic words, "freely ye have received, freely give."

Five minutes elapsed and he was still walking the floor with the same restless tread, his soul tossed backwards and forwards by contending emotions. Suddenly he stopped before the fire again.

"Where is my hat, Amy dear?"

"Why, don't you hear the snow beat against the window, uncle? Are you going out again in the wind and storm?"

"I must, my darling. There is something very important that I have forgotten."

And he went forth again into the darkness and howling tempest, with a strong, brave resolution, striving in his heart against the pang of remorse that the sweet child's voice had unwittingly awakened. As he turned to look back for an instant, he beheld an infant face at the window, with long curls falling around its earnest brow. She was watching him on his way—his little guardian angel.

The boy still sat on a door step in a narrow street, with his face buried in his hands, and apparently lost in a sort of stupor. The merchant softly touched his shoulder. He looked up with a start, but almost ere his withered eyes could recognize any distinct form in the dim lamp light, he was alone again, while the glimmering ray was reflected from a broad gold piece in his hand. He staggered to his feet, with a faint exclamation, and the wealthy merchant went on his way, rendered richer, for by the blessings of him that was ready to perish!

It was growing late, and no one was in the store when the merchant arrived there, except his agent and book-keeper, who were comparing accounts. They both rose to their feet, astonished at this unusual apparition.

"Mr. Parker!"

"Sir!"

"Did you follow my directions about that woman—that poor widow in Morden street?"

"I haven't yet, sir," stammered the agent, with a guilty, apologetic air, "the time has been too short. The first thing to-morrow I intend to—"

"Tell her she may keep the house for the present and we'll say nothing about the rent—We mustn't be hard upon these poor people, Mr. Parker. And stay—send her round to my house to-morrow, and we'll see what can be done for her."

Before the good natured agent could express his sincere pleasure at this novel aspect of things, the door had closed, and his employer was hastening homeward again, with a far lighter and more cheering heart.

"It is true," he mused, while his footsteps mechanically trod the old accustomed route, "I am but the almoner of my Father's bounty—Strange that it never occurred to me before how much good might be done in the highways and byeways of this world. How many, many, many years have I walked in the path of luxury, while brethren were fainting on the wayside, but for a morsel of my overflowing plenty. It shall be so no more! The future is my own; but for the long, irrevocable past, God forgive me, I cannot forgive myself!"

The red glow of the fire was shining over a silent group in that lofty room—the merchant in his easy chair, with an open book on the little stand at his side, and the beautiful child sitting at his feet, her face half hidden in shadow, and the sunny hair parted back from the transparent brow, like bands of gold. The serious tender eyes, blue and dewy, like forest violets, were fixed on the old man's countenance with loving earnestness.

"What are you murmuring to yourself, uncle, dear?"

"Look, my little Amy."

He held the old and time-worn Bible so that the fire light gleamed upon its sacred pages, and bending down, the little child read the sweet words:

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise!"

THE NEW CASKET.

AS THIS IS THE AGE OF IMPROVEMENT and Refinement, the undersigned takes pleasure in saying that he is now prepared to furnish an entire construction to the Undertaker line, equal to any thing ever before in request. It is of his own manufacture, made in the Charles form, and is hereby ornamented, with a thick plate glass running the entire length of top. A full length view can be seen with ease.

The CASKET is a name of the glorious and unclassical ornament of the full style of Coffin. They are perfectly air tight, and are very light, convenient for transportation, or placing in vaults, or common interments. A similar style is much used in eastern cities.

Persons in the trade, and wishing to procure an item in the trade line, will find it much to their interest to call and examine for themselves, where they will find every attention given. DANL'L W. BUTT, Undertaker.
