A CARD.

F. A. KUEFFNER, M. D.,

HOMOEOPATHIC PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON, Will wish to inform the Citizens of Memphis and its vicinity, that he has located himself at the corner of Union and second streets. Having had an ample opportunity of medical experience in the South during a period of two years, in Jackson, Miss., and four years in Charleston, S. C., where he treated from 1850 to 1854 the yellow fever, an epidemic of the small-pox, besides the very severe epidemics of typhus and tetanus, the doctor solicits, most respectfully, the patronage of an enlightened community, and upon honorable but little known, bids leave to offer a few remarks, respectfully.

Homoeopathy is derived from the Greek words "homoion pathos," meaning similar suffering. Hahnemann, the ingenious founder of the system, dwelt minutely that kind of medicine which would be the cure of a given disease by the use of a remedy or remedies, which, if taken by healthy persons in large doses, have produced the same disease—symptomatic, a most similar or set of symptoms in the process.

The writing of Hippocrates, Paracelsus, Cullen and others, alluding to cures just cited with the remedies which are able to produce similar sufferings with that of the patient, led Hahnemann to the exclusive establishment of the principle of "like cures like," giving to similitude curative as the safest and speediest mode of medical practice.

Homoeopathy being everywhere the favorite of the enlightened part of the community, the "obdurate" in it want only an opportunity with its practitioners to become warm advocates of it, while the "obstinacy" in the to-most doses have allowed themselves to be misleading, and, cannot, therefore, be impartial judges. Prejudice, however, is not confined to allopathists—it is one of the lymph of the mind even pertaining the disposition to the most similar, although much severed from allopathy, yet, by the popular process of putting the burnt limb near to the fire or of rubbing frozen limbs with snow, where the direction of the effect of such cases is referred by reference to the physiological fact of the blight and sensibility of the nerves of a sick organ or organs of a disease, by external objects, and resort to natural stimuli, for the performance of legitimate functions. Too warm heat or too light to be able to see or read comfortably—the effect of the sun's rays, perhaps, to speak about to be undervoid by most, yet you have seen friends who suffered from inflammation of the eyes, and could not bear the smallest ray of light, or fresh air, or even
