E APPEAL.

A LADY SINGING.

Oh my lady sang to me
A song or the lost one that sleeps by the sea,
I the grave on the rock and the pines-tree,
Strange was the pleasure that over me stole,
For 'twas made of old sadness that lives in my soul.

So it grew my heart at each tender word,
That the cities in my bosom scarcely stirred,
And I fearly breathed, but only heard;
Where was I? Not in the world of men,
Until she awake me with silence again.

Light shed, we played on the pictured walls,
From the maids that flutter'd on side the hall,
And hidden of the deathgone—ah, ah! not all,
Too little for that all the flower would be;
Such a orphaned she was and left to me.

When my senses returned, and the song was o'er,
I felt would have said to her, "sing it one more?"
But to ask—he smiled, my wish I forebore;
Made enough in her look I form'd,
And the kiss on her lip so mid sweet as sound.

A Curious Marriage and Divorce Suit.

MARRYING A WIFE TO REMAIN BEING EATEN FOR DINNER.

From the Paris Correspondence of the Tow on Post]

The law gossip of the week concerns most especially those who go down to the sea in ships, and may serve as a warning lesson to those who prefer present security to future peace and happiness. A year or two ago, M. Malfilatre, the honor, hope and heir of a renowned calico printer, stocking maker and night cap vendor of Rouen, set sail from Havre to proceed to Sidney, in order to superintend the business which his father carried on in that place, and which the death of his partner had left without surveillance. One of those accidents which will happen in the midst of certain or compass, even in the best governed ships on the ocean, happened, as a matter of course, to the rotten little bark in which Malfilatre set sail—and on the inhospitable shore of Wallis's Island it was wrecked; everything lost but M. Malfilatre, to whom everything was lost but honor. The plump person and defenseless state of the young merchant became a great temptation to the dainty inhabitants of Wallis's Island, who have disgusted the missionaries by eating each other, and they carried him away to the chief's hut, with loud shouts of triumph at the sweet morsel which the waves had thrown upon their shore.

The Catholic missionaries have a small establishment of the Maristes on the island. They work night and day, with unremitting zeal, at the conversion of these savages, and have got as far as the prevention of infanticide for gastronomic purposes, which is a great step; but they have not as yet been able to inspire that wholesome dislike of human flesh, which should certainly form the first step in every conversion to Christianity. The poor young man, in his dilemma, appealed piteously to the reverend fathers; but they confessed that they possessed no influence; that they were barely tolerated, and dared not interfere. The only rescue to be expected could be obtained by choosing a wife amongst the native women, and consenting to remain on the island forever. After much persuasion from the missionary he accepted the latter alternative, and the body politic of the chief, with the consent of the nation, chose a bride for the young man, and took special care to choose a good part—no less a one than the daughter of the chief. One thing, however, the father insisted on, the marriage should be celebrated seriously after Catholic rites; and at all events the bridegroom should be bound by proper registers, and not be permitted to treat the sacred ceremony with the same lightness as it is elsewhere.

Everything was consented to by the young man, who had grown attached to life by means of a good supper; and, accordingly, on the next day the beautiful Suleta, all freshly tatooed from head to foot—her fair proportions undisfigured by crinoline—was led to the altar of the Maristes by M. Malfilatre. But, of course, our hero from Rouen had treated the whole thing as a little harmless expedient to keep a safe skin and whole bones in this hungry land, and soon began to long for an opportunity of quitting the scenes of his connubial felicity. Some months elapsed, however, before this opportunity occurred; but at length, one afternoon, wandering disconsolate on the beach, he descried a vessel in the offing. It was a Spanish vessel, whose boats crew, in answer to the signal of distress hoisted by the bridegroom, hastened to the rescue, and bore him off to the ship without discovery on the part of the native. Suleta wept for a fortnight, and we think all had they been aware of the treachery intended. M. Malfilatre landed safe and sound at Havre only two months ago. He found that great changes had taken place in his father's household during his absence. An Englishman had fallen in—fortune had smiled most gracciously upon the old man, and the son, after all his wretchedness and misery, returned to find himself the heir of wealth he had never dreamed of. The first thing he did was to go to Rouen, to do it, as we all know, to provide himself with a rich wife; the father began to look about him, and, having found a suitable match, the parties were straightway brought forth to be married.

But now arose the difficulty—young Malfilatre could not deny his marriage at Wallis' Island by a Catholic priest, according to Catholic rites. The marriage was legal in every point of view, except in the presence of the non-consent of the parents of the bridegroom. So, there was notice served by a huissier upon the "Demoiselle Suleta, falsely calling herself Madame Malfilatre," to show cause why she should not be dispossessed of that title. Of course the whole affair was considered a mighty good joke by the gossips, and laughed at accordingly; for, of course, after the delay expired, no public circle appearing judgment would go by default, and Malfilatre might be free to marry whom he pleased. Thus did the affair stand until last week, when lo! to the utter confusion of the sanguine bridegroom and his rich father, the Bishop of Australia Oceania, in whose diocese lies that paradise of which we have given some of the most striking traits de mœurs, and in defense of morality and religion, proclaims himself ready to become parte civile in this case for the protection of the hapless Suleta. We may judge of the consternation thrown among the ranks of jewelers, coiffeurs, and modistes, all engaged for the rich marriage—the tears of the rich bride of the morrow, and the fabulous bills of the trousseau, which are to come on directly will be full of interest and of warning at the same time. The case is considered one of the most curious on record, and has been complicated since the arrival of the last mail by the news of the arrival of news of the birth at Wallis' Island of a son to the house of Malfilatre, who now shares the interest hitherto absorbed by the tattooed Suleta.

New Method of Extracting Teeth without Pain.

From the New York Tribune, 8th inst.]

Various modes of relieving the pain caused by extracting teeth have been practiced by dentists, some of which, as by the use of ether and chloroform, while they were generally effective, were objectionable for the injurious consequences that sometimes followed. Hence dentists are, for the most part, shy of administering them. The want of some agent that should simply benumb the nerve only during the time of the operation, and the influence of which should then disappear, has been so urgent that a multitude of expedients have been tried, and some of these are practiced by pretenders in the profession, which are but fraudulent devices to obtain patients. For these reasons, any new agent of these pretensions is and ought to be regarded with great distrust until it has been submitted to long and successful practice. We shall, therefore, speak cautiously of the method brought to the notice of the dentists of this city within the last month, and now upon trial by some of them. It is the application of the galvanic current, excited by a small battery, and is used for the purpose of benumbing one of the poles being attached to the extracting forceps, and the other held in the hand. A little apparatus is attached by which the operator with his foot causes the circuit to be closed and he applies the instrument. The electrical current is small in quantity, causing but a slight and not unpleasant sensation when the two poles are held, one in each hand. There is nothing, therefore, at all alarming in the application. When the forceps are applied to the tooth the operator treads upon a little spring, which closes a break in the wire, and at the same instant draws the tooth. The effect appears to be simply benumbing the nerve, which shock being too virtiginy for the relief to be ascribed to this distracting the attention of the patient.

We have ourselves seen but one operation performed with it, but we are assured that several hundred teeth have been extracted in this city the last week with great satisfaction to the patients. The opportunity of witnessing the experiment occurred while we were in the office of the dentist—a stranger who had heard of the operation calling to have a tooth extracted. He was an Englishman, forty-two years of age, with a full and splended set of teeth. A wisdom tooth only had been extracted, and the removal of that caused so much pain he was ready enough to try the process for the removal of another. The tooth was drawn without any manifestation of pain, and on questioning the patient he assured us that he felt none—that the great sensation being in the hand of which he held one pole of the battery. He expressed himself highly gratified with the operation. Another patient, a young lad, whose tooth had been taken out in the same way, declared the sensation as only "a kind of a tickling." The process, we understand, was invented by a dentist of Philadelphia, and has been for sometime before the profession of that city and Baltimore. It is properly regarded as yet experimental, dentists are yet being fully committed to its adoption, though we have heard no objection advanced to its use. Should it prove what certainly seems probable, it will be by far the best agent yet applied—perfectly harmless, acting only during the time of the operation, and affecting only the nerve itself, which in ordinary cases transmits the pain. Nor will the application be limited to the extraction of teeth, for it seems equally well adapted to most surgical operations, the conducting wire being attached to the lancet or other instrument equally as well as to the dentist's forceps.

THE UNION

Patent Circular Mill!

Cuts from 10,000 to 12,000 feet of Lumber per Day of Twelve Hours!

WE are at length enabled to inform our numerous cust-mers that we have so perfected, by new important improvements, the Union Circular Saw Mill, that we have no hesitation in pronouncing it superior to anything yet offered the lumberman. Strong and well made, having about double the stock of wood and iron work in the same class of mill. The superiority of speed is shown so that if we want a first class mill, it can only be had by a liberal order of Yellow pine material. The guides for carriage are planed, and the rolls turned iron bets that the log is made to move in a true line, easy and without jar. The saw will cut 1 to 3 inches in style, size, 24 inches with long bearings so that we have better vibration or brasing of shaft.

The patent Rack and Pinion have introduced combined the highest practice of practical sawyers. A large saving of time with increased efficiency and strength are obtained in this new feed. The Rack and Pinion feed of appearing extraordinary, say how much lumber we have to put per hour. If the feed motion is adjusted to a very small out of lumber is present, 1200 feet per hour of poplar, pine, walnut, &c., can be cut without taxing the full capacity of the mill.

In offering these improved circular mills it is not to do not expect to compete in price with other parties who have inferior goods, but we do claim for our mills superiority of durability. Still we offer them as low as can possibly be afforded, considering the amount of labor and material used in them.

The following are our lowest cash prices, which include the saw, carriage and mandrel, with the usual allowance of spare-ing extraordinary, say how much lumber we have to put per hour. If the feed motion is adjusted to a very small out of lumber is present, 1200 feet per hour of poplar, pine, walnut, &c., can be cut without taxing the full capacity of the mill.
